

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. # CHRONOLOGY OF "THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES."

THE PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY contains all that can be collected of the Legislative History of this country from the Conquest to the close of the XVIIIth Century (1803), 36 vols. The chief sources whence these Debates are derived are the Constitutional History, 24 vols. ; Sir Simonds D'Ewes' Journal ; Debates of the Commons in 1620 and 1621 ; Chandler and Timberland's Debates, 22 vols. ; Grey's Debates of the Commons, from 1667 to 1694, 10 vols. ; Almon's Debates, 24 vols. ; Debrett's Debates, 63 vols. ; The Hardwicke Papers ; Debates in Parliament by Dr. Johnson, &c., &c.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES commence with the year 1803, and the contents are set forth in the following Chronological Table :—

Amendment proposed—

“In page 71, line 15, at end, to insert the words ‘The expression “intoxicating liquor” means any fermented, distilled, or spirituous liquor which cannot according to any law for the time being in force be legally sold without a licence from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.’”—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Mr. Bowles... ... 828

Question put, and agreed to.

The Attorney-General for Ireland (Mr. Cherry, Liverpool, Exchange) ... 829

Amendment proposed—

“In page 77, line 23, to leave out subsection (7), and to insert the words: ‘42 & 43 Vict., c. 49. 47 and 48 Vict., c. 19. (7) References to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, shall, save as otherwise provided in this subsection, be construed as references to the Summary Jurisdiction over Children (Ireland) Act, 1834, and the reference to Section 10 of the first-mentioned Act shall be construed as a reference to Section 4 of the last-mentioned Act. 14 & 15 Vict., c. 93. The reference to the provisions of the first-mentioned Act with respect to recognisances to be of good behaviour shall be construed as a reference to the provisions of the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, with respect to recognisances to keep the peace. The reference to the First Schedule of the first-mentioned Act shall not apply. For the provisions of this Act giving power to make rules under the first-mentioned Act, the following provision shall be substituted: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland may make rules regulating the procedure of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act, and other matters incidental thereto, and all rules so made shall be laid as soon as may be before both Houses of Parliament.’”—(Mr. Cherry.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments proposed—

Mr. Crooks (Woolwich) ... .. 1656

Amendment proposed—

"In line 1, to leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, and add the words 'while recognising the importance of the promise of the Prime Minister to introduce legislation next session for dealing with unemployment on a permanent basis, and whilst welcoming the promise to administer with more elasticity the existing Act and to provide more money to make that possible, this House is of opinion that the proposals made are quite inadequate to meet the pressing needs of the unemployed this winter, and that the responsibility for the absence of proper machinery even for carrying out existing powers and the general unpreparedness of the country to meet the present unemployed crisis is due to the neglect of the Government to make provision for a state of affairs which was clearly foreseen.'"—(Mr. Keir Hardie.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Resolution."

THE SITUATION IN THE BALKAN PENINSULA.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government a Question of which I have given them private notice. We on this side of the House desire to know whether they are in a position to afford us any information not already in our possession with regard to the situation in the Balkan Peninsula. I make no apology for asking that Question. The events which have followed one another with ominous rapidity during the last few days have created a feeling of profound anxiety throughout Europe, and, I think I may add, a feeling of the utmost dismay in this country—this country in which one Government after another has spared no efforts to avoid the crisis which has apparently been precipitated by the conduct of some of the European Powers.

We shall be glad to know whether His Majesty's Government can tell us anything as to the facts of the case, and as to their own attitude with regard to the situation. I couple that Question with this reservation. Nothing is further from my thoughts than to press Ministers for any information which they think it is contrary to the public interest to give at the present moment. We have followed with attention the statements lately made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and by the Prime Minister upon these subjects, and I may be permitted to say that in my humble opinion nothing could have been more dignified in tone or more appropriate in substance than the statement made by Sir Edward Grey last week. If when I sit down my noble friend, who will, I suppose, follow me, tells me that he has nothing to add to Sir Edward Grey's statement I shall make no complaint whatever; and I can assure noble Lords opposite, speaking, I am sure, for those who sit round me, that our one desire is to strengthen the hands of His Majesty's Government and to assist them in accomplishing the task to which we understand from the Prime Minister they have set themselves—the two-fold task of maintaining the public law of Europe and preventing the disturbance of the peace of the world.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Lord FITZMAURICE): My Lords, nobody, I am certain, on whichever side of the House he sits or whatever his opinions upon any issue of foreign policy may be, could possibly complain for one moment of my noble friend having asked this question directly your Lordships' House re-assembled. This House has always been the scene of great debates on foreign policy, and it is quite natural that on this occasion a Question should be asked in regard to the grave issues which have recently arisen in the East of Europe.

In regard to the facts of the case, I do not think that I have anything to add to what has already been publicly stated in what are called the ordinary sources of information. The events to which my noble friend has alluded have not been done in secret; they have been announced on the house-tops, and they are public property. But there is, of course, the far graver and more difficult question as to what the course of European diplomacy is to be, and, more particularly, the question which occupies your Lordships' attention—what the course of the diplomacy of this country is to be. I have to thank my noble friend for the language in which he has spoken of the statement made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at Wooler in the course of last week. I am glad that he, speaking with his high authority, has endorsed the approval which has been given already by the general public both to the tone and to the substance of Sir Edward Grey's speech, and it is an encouragement to His Majesty's Government to think that in this matter, grave and troublesome as it is, they will have behind them not merely the voice of their own Party, but, they believe, the confidence of the united nation.

As my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated in that speech, and as the Prime Minister, also, I think, on the same day, publicly stated, it is impossible for this country, in the interest of the value of treaties, to recognise an alteration of them made by any individual State without the consent of the other parties. That principle, as your Lordships know, was laid down in a European document of the highest importance in 1871 at the time of the denunciation of the clauses of the Black Sea Treaty by Russia, when a conference assembled in London, and when, on the proposal of Lord Granville, before any alteration was consented to in the substance of the Treaty of Paris of 1856, all the high contracting Powers united in the declaration the text of which, is, I think, by this time perfectly well known to your Lordships, because it has been reprinted in nearly every newspaper in the United Kingdom.

We hold, my Lords, to the principle laid down in that historic document. We regard the events which have recently taken place in the Near East as necessitating consideration by the Powers with a view of arriving at a settlement which shall show due regard to the interests of Turkey, or of any other State which may have been prejudiced by recent changes, but we cannot admit the right of any individual State to be the judge in its own cause. We hope and trust that a solution will be found, and we shall use our influence to help to secure that it shall be both peaceful and equitable. No definite arrangement for a Conference has yet been come to, and the question of how a settlement can be attained, and what should be comprised in it, is at present forming the subject of discussion. Meanwhile, we hope that those who naturally feel aggrieved will not precipitate a crisis by hasty action and will continue to display the moderation and restraint which have hitherto distinguished them, relying upon the general desire which we believe exists to show fair consideration for their interests.

I may add this, that while on the one hand we recognise, and joyfully recognise, as the whole people of this country have, the great change in the direction of improved administration and reform in Turkey, we also do not forget how, for many years past, we have also asserted and vindicated the rights and liberties of what are known as the Christian populations of the Balkan Peninsula. Those two principles are not in any manner incompatible, and we fully believe that it will not be beyond the strength and the power and the skill of the diplomacy of Europe to secure the maintenance of those improved institutions which have come into being in Turkey, and at the same time to maintain the goodwill of the minor States of the Balkan Peninsula which are bound to us by the memories of the past thirty years. I hope that the House will con-in this short statement adequate under the circumstances of the moment, which, as my noble friend himself will be the first to recognise, require the most extreme inspection and the greatest care on my part and on that of others who have to speak elsewhere in the language used if we are to obtain a satisfactory and a peaceful solution.

Copy presented, of Orders in Council approving Memorials of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty praying sanction to—1. An improvement in the pay of Captains in the Royal Marines after eleven and fourteen years seniority, respectively, dated 1st August, 1908; 2. The payment of an allowance of 10s. a month to Warrant Officers and Officers promoted therefrom, when employed on duties connected with target practice and other duties, for wear and tear of clothing, dated 1st August, 1908; 3. An extension of the allowances for bread-making on board His Majesty's ships, dated 26th September, 1908; 4. Extra pay for Seamen and Artificer Divers at depths of more than 25 fathoms, dated 26th September 1908; 5. The payment of an allowance of 3d. a day to Seamen Gunners employed on clerical duties under certain conditions, dated 26th September, 1908; 6. The payment of an allowance of 2s. 6d. a day to the Assistant Paymaster appointed for duty with the Captain Commanding Torpedo Destroyers of the Channel Fleet for work of an onerous and responsible character, dated 26th September, 1908 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

ECCLESIASTICAL FEES.

Copy presented, of Order in Council, dated 6th October, 1908, allowing a Table of Ecclesiastical Fees and Payments settled by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Archbishop of York, in pursuance of the Acts 1 and 2 Vic., c. 106, and 30 and 31 Vic., c. 135 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

EVICTED TENANTS (IRELAND) ACT, 1907.

Copy presented, of Return giving particulars of cases in which persons have been reinstated with the assistance of the Estates Commissioners during the quarter ended 30th June, 1908 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Retrenchment of the South African Constabulary.

MR. GODFREY BARING (Isle of Wight): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether 1,200 men of the South African Constabulary were retrenched while that force was under the control of the High Commissioner and the Inter-Colonial Council.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) These retrenchments took place while the force was still under the High Commissioner and Inter-Colonial Council, but they were really effected on the advice of Ministers which Lord Selborne felt he ought to follow.

Magistrates and Birching.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the fact that Mr. Fordham in the North London Police Court on Tuesday last, in a case in which a boy was charged with misconduct, called up the father of the lad and told him that the law precluded him from administering a good flogging, and that he should have to send the boy to gaol for several months, but stated that if the father flogged the boy within the precincts of the Court, and if the gaoler reported to the magistrate that he had had a proper flogging, he would let him go; whether he is aware that Mr. Fordham told the father of the boy, who was reluctant to flog him, you must give him twelve strokes with the birch-rod, nice, steady, full strokes; you must wait a little, however, for meanwhile the gaoler will put the birch in water to make it nice and pliable; and whether he will take any, and, if so, what, steps in relation to this incident.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I find on inquiry that the boy to whom the Question refers was convicted of indecent exposure with intent to insult three girls, which offence he did not deny. The magistrate, feeling that the offence could not be passed over without punishment, but being reluctant to send a boy of fifteen to prison, released him without imprisonment, on condition that his father birched him, which was done in the precincts of the Court. The father agreed that this was the proper punishment for the lad. I do not propose to take any action in the matter.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

H.M.S. "Whiting."

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Board has yet ascertained what rank and numbers of officers, together with the numbers of seamen and stokers, were on board H.M.S. "Whiting" at the time she was blown ashore at Hong-Kong; what position she occupied at anchor; and what is the complement of the vessel in full commission.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): One lieutenant and one engineer-lieutenant were on board, together with three-fifths of full crew. The "Whiting" was at the time at Chung-Kwang-O for exercises.

War Material.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that in the two years prior to the general election £1,606,000 was voted under Army Estimates and £5,270,000 under Navy Estimates for guns, projectiles, ammunition, torpedoes, and gun-cotton, while in the last two years, 1907-8 and 1908-9, £897,000 under Army Estimates and £2,351,000 under Navy Estimates have been voted in each case; and whether the Defence Committee have examined these figures during the recess and can give the corresponding figures of actual expenditure, together with an assurance that, in spite of these reductions of 44 per cent. for the Army and 56 per cent. in the case of the Navy in the amount voted for these war stores, there has been no diminution in our immediate readiness for war.

MR. McKENNA: The Prime Minister has asked me to reply to that part of the Question which concerns the Admiralty. The figure for the items quoted for 1904-5, 1905-6, is correct—that for 1907-8, 1908-9, incorrect, and should be £3,351,000 not £2,351,000; the percentage reduction is therefore 36 per cent., not 56 per cent. The actual expenditure for the period 1904-5 was £5,254,294. The full expenditure for 1907-8, 1908-9 has not yet been incurred, and therefore cannot be given. There has been no diminution in our immediate readiness for war.

Adjutants of Territorial Units.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is his intention before the end of the year to post regular adjutants to all recognised Territorial units for which adjutants are allowed.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): Adjutants have been appointed to almost all recognised units for which adjutants are allowed, and no doubt all will be posted by the date referred to. Regular officers are in almost all cases being selected for these important appointments, but under certain circumstances it has been decided that officers of the Territorial Force may be considered for appointment if recommended by the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief.

MR. ASHLEY: Can the right hon. Gentleman state what are the special circumstances which justify him in departing from the usual practice?

MR. HALDANE: That is for the General Officer Commanding to consider. There may be some extremely competent officer in the Territorial Force whom it may be desirable to appoint.

Yeomanry Non-Commissioned Officers and the Separation Allowance.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether all married non-commissioned officers in the Yeomanry, including those who hold lance appointments, will receive separation allowance.

MR. HALDANE: All married non-commissioned officers, including those holding lance appointments, who are paid at the rates prescribed for the Territorial Yeomanry, will receive separation allowance. The allowance will not be drawn by non-commissioned officers who retain the old Yeomanry rates and conditions of pay, as it was not an emolument enjoyed by the Imperial Yeomanry.

Saumur Cavalry School.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is proposed to send any officers to attend a course at the cavalry school of Saumur; if so, how many officers, and of what rank, will proceed there; and will all expenses be defrayed from War Office funds.

MR. HALDANE: Two cavalry lieutenants are attending a course at the cavalry school at Saumur which commences this month. The question of the allowances which will be made to these officers is receiving consideration.

MR. ASHLEY: Are we to understand that officers who desire to make themselves efficient by this means will have all their out of pocket expenses?

MR. HALDANE was understood to reply that the whole matter was being considered.

Calcutta—Gossain's Assassination.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can give the House any information regarding the assassination of the approver Gossain in gaol at Calcutta.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): The facts of this most regrettable case have been reported in the newspapers. The approver was shot in Alipur Gaol on August 31st, by two of the accused in the Manicktola bomb conspiracy case, who obtained access to him on the pretence that they wished to make a confession. At the time when the Government of India telegraphed the facts, there was no clue as to how the murderers obtained possession of the revolvers. Full inquiry is being made into all the circumstances of the case, but the Secretary of State has not yet heard the result. The trial of the accused took place before the Sessions Judge of Alipur on September 7th, 8th, and 9th.

The Balkan Peninsula.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): May I ask whether the Prime Minister is prepared to make any statement with regard to the events which have occurred in Bulgaria?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): As my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and I myself have already publicly stated, it is impossible for this country, in the interest of the value of treaties, to recognise an alteration of them made by any individual State without the consent of the other parties. We hold to that principle. We regard the events which have recently taken place in the Near East as necessitating consideration by the Powers with the view of arriving at a settlement which shall show due regard to the interests of Turkey or any States which may have been prejudiced by recent changes. We hope and trust that a solution will be found, and we shall use our influence to help to secure that it shall be both peaceful and equitable. No definite arrangement for a Conference has been come to, and the question of how a settlement can be attained, and what should be comprised in it, is at present forming the subject of discussion. Meanwhile, we hope that those who naturally feel aggrieved will not precipitate a crisis by hasty action, and will continue to show the moderation and restraint which have hitherto distinguished them, relying upon the general desire which we believe exists to show fair consideration for their interests.

Roman Catholic Disabilities.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Government will introduce at an early date legislation for the repeal of such statutory enactments affecting Roman Catholics as place them in a disadvantageous and inferior position as compared with other religious bodies in this country?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Is it not a fact that a Bill for this purpose, removing these disabilities from Roman Catholics, has been introduced for many years into this House by a private Member sitting on the Nationalist Benches? May I ask, if such a Bill be re-introduced, whether the Government will support it, and give facilities for its passing?

MR. ASQUITH: I will ask the noble Lord and the hon. Member to put the Questions on the Paper, when I will give them due consideration.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to give notice that I will put on the Paper the Question the Prime Minister asks me. At the same time, in accordance with the notice I have given for the 27th of this month, I will ask leave to introduce a Bill to remove the disabilities which affect the Roman Catholic population.

The Government and the Unemployed.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I desire to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which I have given private notice, namely, whether in view of the great amount of suffering caused by the present extent of unemployment he can state when the Government will be in a position to inform the House what he proposes to do to alleviate the distress, and when a day can be given to discuss this subject.

MR. ASQUITH: The hon. Gentleman may be assured that this matter is engaging the very serious consideration of the Government, and I hope in the course of a very few days that we shall be able to make a statement. Then it will be possible to say whether further discussion is or is not necessary.

London Electricity Bills Second Reading.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Has the Prime Minister received an intimation that it will be very inconvenient to many London Members, and especially to the hon. Member for Fulham, who is to move the rejection of these Bills, to take the London Electricity Bills to-night or this week; and can the right hon. Gentleman see his way to postpone them for a week or two?

MR. ASQUITH: The Bills will not be proceeded with to-day or to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. WALTER LONG: Has the Prime Minister anything to say as to the general course of business this week? May I ask also whether the Government will be prepared to give the House an opportunity to discuss the regulations that have been issued under the Old-Age Pensions Act from time to time, and which, I believe, under the Rules of the House have to lie on the Table for twenty-one days before they become law? There are several points arising under these regulations which some hon. Members would like to discuss.

MR. ASQUITH: As regards the course of business this week, it will remain as I foreshadowed it before the House rose. We shall take the Children Bill to-day and to-morrow, and the Prevention of Crimes Bill if there is time. The remainder of the week will be devoted to the Licensing Bill under the closure resolutions. As regards the regulations under the Old-Age Pensions Act, if the right hon. Gentleman and any other Members will be good enough to indicate to me what are the particular points on which they desire discussion to take place, I will give careful consideration to them, and see if it will be to the general convenience of the House to discuss them.

WRIT ISSUED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had issued during the Adjournment a Warrant for a New Writ for the City of Newcastle-on-Tyne, in the room of Thomas Cairns, esquire, deceased.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Rupert Edward Cecil Lee Guinness, esquire, commonly called the hon. Rupert Guinness, for the Parliamentary Borough of Shoreditch (Haggerston Division).

PROVISIONAL ORDERS PROCEDURE BILL [LORDS].

Read the first time; to be read a second time To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 363.]

CHILDREN BILL.

Order for Consideration, as amended (by the Standing Committee), read.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) moved the recommittal of the measure in respect of Clauses 39 to 44, which made it a criminal offence for any boy or girl under sixteen to buy cigarettes or cigarette papers, or to be seen smoking cigarettes in a public place. He said he was not taking this course with any idea of hostility towards the Bill, which, generally speaking, was one that in his opinion should receive the support of Members in all parts of the House; indeed, he believed the Under-Secretary for the Home Department would be the first to admit that in pressing it forward he had received material assistance in Grand Committee from hon. Members on the Opposition side. His action, therefore, was not dictated by any dislike of the Bill; it was due rather to the idea that certain clauses were open to misconception, and he desired that the House as a whole should consider their bearing. The clauses he referred to were numbered 39 to 44, and these made it a criminal offence for any boy or girl under sixteen years of age to buy any cigarettes or cigarette papers or to be seen smoking a cigarette in a public place. He would like to draw attention to the arguments by which these drastic proposals were supported. They seemed to him to suggest a kind of flavour of immorality attaching to the smoking of cigarettes by boys and girls. It had been sought to support the general provisions of the Bill by reference to the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords which in 1906 examined into this question. He had read that Report, and he ventured to say there really was no ground at all for any such opinion. In his view a more tenable ground of objection was that cigarette-smoking by young people was very unhealthy. A great deal had been said about the injury done to the constitution of children by the practice, but if they examined the evidence he thought they would arrive at the conclusion that the objection on that ground was not so strong as it was generally thought to be. There were two witnesses on whom the House of Lords Committee mainly relied—Professor Sims Woodhead and Sir William Broadbent, and neither of these gentlemen was able to assign any specific evil to cigarette-smoking, although both agreed very strongly that it was bad for everybody, and certainly for the young. But when people talked of it as inflicting a terrific injury on the health of the youth of this country there seemed to be some danger of exaggeration. He did not himself believe that either of those gentlemen—Sir William Broadbent was unhappily no longer with them—or any other medical man would maintain that cigarette-smoking was worse, for instance, than habitually keeping children out of bed until a very late hour; yet no one proposed to make it an offence for a child to be seen in the streets after a certain hour at night. He also doubted very much whether cigarette-smoking was as bad for children as excessive indulgence in sweets. Professor Woodhead said that bad as the smoking of tobacco was for young children the smoking of brown paper was a great deal worse, yet, oddly enough, that was not to be made a criminal offence. He was not offering these observations with any idea of advocating cigarette-smoking; he was not himself a cigarette-smoker. He did not doubt that children were very much better without cigarette-smoking, and certainly indulgence in it to an excessive extent must be bad for them. He agreed that it was a bad habit, and that in some cases it did real harm. They therefore had in it the first requirement of legislation; they had an evil to cope with, but before they passed the legislation they must consider whether it was going to do any good. The question was not whether tobacco or cigarette-smoking was an evil for the young, but whether their legislation would cure it. To arrive at a decision on that point they must first ask themselves: Why did boys and girls smoke cigarettes? Why did they smoke this filthy stuff, which was not even tobacco, which they bought at the rate of five for 1d., and which was even nastier than brown paper? The reply to that question was that they smoked out of bravado, and not because they were going to get such pleasure as the ordinary smoker claimed to obtain—although, personally, he had never been able to see where it came in; they smoked in order to swagger and pretend that they were older than they really were. If it were made a criminal offence there was a risk of encouraging the boys who now smoked to smoke more than ever. This was not a matter for the criminal law at all, and it was important that that law should not be applied to a subject to which it was not properly applicable. And it was even more important to avoid saying: “We disapprove such-and-such a practice; we will therefore make it a criminal offence for people to indulge in it and will bring them before the criminal Courts.” That would be very likely to bring the criminal law into disrepute, and it was a procedure too which was bad in itself. It was for that reason mainly that he was opposed to this group of clauses.

*MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is now discussing the clauses themselves. I must point out that in moving the re-committal of the Bill a Member is not entitled to discuss the merits of the clauses, but merely to give reasons why they should be sent to a Select Committee.

LORD R. CECIL said he very much regretted that he should have transgressed the proper limits of order, but what he was anxious to show was that these clauses required further consideration before they were passed into law, and in order to obtain such consideration they should be sent to a Select Committee with power to hear fresh evidence. There was one proposal which required to be very seriously considered; and that was the provision that the parents of a child brought before the criminal courts should also be required to attend. If they compelled a parent to come to a court to hear a case against his child, they would fine that parent the amount of a day's work, if not inflict upon him more serious injury. They ought to consider very carefully before they made this a criminal offence. There was one passage in the evidence given before the Lords Select Committee which the House would do well to carefully consider. Sir W. Broadbent was asked whether smoking led to drinking, and he replied that in his opinion the two habits went very much together. Smoking was not merely an incentive to thirst, but it encouraged self-indulgence, and self-indulgence in one thing led to self-indulgence in another. It amounted to this, that the evil of cigarette smoking in the opinion of this distinguished doctor was not so much an actual physical evil as that it led to self-indulgence when its twin led to moral degradation. They ought, therefore, very carefully to consider before they passed a law which would in fact apply to a child the criminal law for the correction of what was merely a moral offence. It was on these grounds he desired to have this group of clauses further considered. Everybody admitted that cigarette-smoking was bad for children; everyone would agree that if parents did their duty they would stop their children indulging in it, but it was a very different thing to make it a criminal offence. He therefore trusted the House would agree to send these clauses to a Select Committee for further consideration, in the hope that they would be moulded in such a form as to avoid the injurious results which he feared would follow their enactment as they now stood.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): I beg to second.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be re-committed to a

Select Committee in respect of Clauses 39 to 44, inclusive."—(Lord Robert Cecil.)

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) said the ruling of the Speaker had rendered it unnecessary for him on that occasion to discuss the merits of that part of the Bill which dealt with juvenile smoking, but when the time came for considering those clauses the Government would have no difficulty in showing both their necessity and their practicability. So far as the necessity for inquiry was concerned, the matter had been carefully considered by three committees. There was the well-known Departmental Committee on Physical Deterioration in 1904, which took evidence on this very subject and came to an unanimous and emphatic conclusion that legislation was necessary for the suppression of juvenile smoking. Two years later the other House appointed a Select Committee specially to deal with the subject. That Committee took much evidence from medical witnesses, schoolmasters, and social workers of all kinds, and it again unanimously and with equal emphasis recommended that legislation practically on the lines of this Bill should be adopted. In the present session they had had prolonged discussions in the Standing Committee on the Bill. That Committee devoted three and a half sittings to the consideration of these clauses alone. The attendance of Members was full; the clauses were most minutely and carefully examined, and though they were opposed by only a very small group of Members the opposition was keen and active and not a point escaped consideration. The closure was never moved throughout the sittings of the Committee. Surely there was no need for further consideration by a fourth Committee. The noble Lord agreed that juvenile smoking was an evil, and the only point therefore, was whether the legislation proposed would cure it or not. That was a matter for the House. If the House thought the clauses unsuitable it had the remedy in its own hands and the clauses could be modified or rejected, but the noble Lord had adduced no new facts or fresh considerations showing that the matter required further examination by a committee. He ventured to suggest indeed that the real object of the noble Lord in moving this Resolution was rather to display at the earliest possible moment his objection to this part of the Bill than to secure its acceptance by the House.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) had much pleasure in supporting the Motion of the noble Lord. He did not think the Under-Secretary had advanced any strong arguments against it. He had told them the matter had been considered by a Departmental Committee as well as by a Select Committee of the House of Lords, but was that any reason why the House of Commons should not have its own Committee to inquire into a matter which vitally affected all classes of people? Surely it was a new doctrine to propound that because the House of Lords had come to a certain decision, that must be accepted as the basis of legislation by the House of Commons. He did not think that that argument would hold water with many hon. Members on the Government benches. This was an extremely important matter, and before they converted the practice of cigarette-smoking by young people into a criminal offence they ought to have the whole question carefully considered by a Committee of their own House. It was not sufficient to look at it from a medical point of view. There was also the question of practicability to be borne in mind, as well as its relation to the interests of the working classes. Before they decided to make a man a criminal because his son of fifteen smoked cigarettes they ought to have strong evidence laid before a responsible tribunal to show the necessity for legislation of that nature.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) reminded the House that he spoke against the whole of these clauses on the Second Reading of the Bill and he need not repeat his views on that occasion. But he desired to point out that in this matter they were making an entirely new departure, and in his opinion they had altogether failed in this ill-considered Bill to deal with the means by which they could most effectively stop cigarette-smoking by boys under sixteen years of age. Let him cite one concrete example to show the inadequacy and weakness of their proposals. Let them consider what would be the operation of the Bill in country districts. It would be the duty of a policeman to summon a boy found smoking before a Petty Sessional Court several miles away—to bring him, and possibly his father, before a Court for the first time. And that Bench would have no power to inflict any punishment at all, but merely to warn him that if he was caught again, it might be with a cigarette in his pocket, he might be fined 5s. That was an undignified position in which to place the Courts of law. Surely it was possible to invent some less clumsy method of dealing with the evil.

There was a German method of dealing with a question of that kind. For instance, in the case of riding a bicycle without a light, they did not hale the offender before a Court, but served him with a notice to pay a shilling or something of that kind, and if he was guilty he paid the shilling and did nothing more. Some such system as that might possibly be evolved in this particular case. What he submitted was that it might be possible to have a Committee with practical experience of sitting in petty sessions, an experience which seemed to be absent from the gentlemen who drew up this Bill, and they would know the unworkability of these clauses. He pressed the House strongly to allow the matter to go to a Committee to see if they could not discover a better way of securing what the House wished to be done, viz., the stopping of smoking by boys under sixteen, than by invoking the criminal law. He hoped the Government would see their way to accede to the Motion, and that some way would be devised for carrying out what they wished to see done, viz., that juvenile smoking should be put an end to.

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said he agreed with the noble Lord and with the last speaker as to the seriousness of making a new crime, especially in such a matter as this. If the Bill had been one to make it a crime for anybody to smoke up to the age of sixty he might have thought better of it. He thought the idea of making it penal to smoke when all his elders ing in his presence was how the fathers of the country were against smoking, let them set t of not smoking. It was b young and old, and he was was not worse for the for the young; old people and young people did not. Government weakened the authority they weakened a authority, and the child cou led astray on all hands. Th want boys forbidden to and that by statute, but had learnt to do their dut do as they were told. Any had attended the discussion House knew how matters w and how there was no time consideration, and he though ments of the last speaker sufficient justification for re matter back to a Committee. the Bill would be ridiculous in form. It forbade cigarette-sm when they reached the last clauses in question it forb things. It did not, howev smoking a big cigar, and it mi it was a Bill to legalise the big cigars by little boys. what it amounted to; the litt get a big cigar, and the C decide what was a big and a little cigar. The little cigar even for a great big boy of feet. The Bill as it stood absurd, and he hoped the H pause before rushing down incline of interfering betwe and their children. Already c been taught by law to think were other people in the count to their parents. The fat think it a good thing for smoke, and why should the b he was smoking because his fatl he should? The law in fut forbid a boy to smoke a cigar would permit him to drink rum, and the boy would say t not forbid him to drink a gla but only his father, and th Government thought it wron rum they would have passed that effect. He would not s

all the vices by which little boys were beset, but the Bill amounted to legalising all these other vices. If they once interfered in this way with such details they would be, in effect, legalising all these other vices. He thought most earnestly and seriously that it would be a good thing if these clauses were referred to a Select Committee, where the whole matter might be argued out at length and in detail. He was not prepared to defend smoking; he believed it was a vile practice, which he learnt when he was young and gave up again in a few years when he had a little more sense. It was true the Government only proposed a reprimand in the first instance, a 5s. fine in the second instance, and 10s. in the third, but if the 10s. was not forthcoming—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is now discussing the clauses of the Bill. He should give reasons for sending these particular clauses back to a Committee and not discuss particulars now. They will come later.

MR. LUPTON said he only wanted to show how serious the matter was if it might lead to a boy being committed to prison for non-payment of a fine.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said he would support his noble friend if he went to a division. He did not propose to discuss the clauses or the order question opened by the hon. Gentleman in regard to whether smoking was wholesome or not. He did not state his views either as to the unwholesomeness of smoking or as to the excellent results following from non-smoking habits. They were asked, and reminded by Mr. Speaker that it was their whole duty to consider, what reasons there were for the adoption of the Motion of his noble friend. The Under-Secretary and the noble Lord had given no reason, and the hon. Gentleman on the other side had given no adequate reason for adhering to this procedure. He had told them he would later on justify these views. He (Mr. Long) had often said to that House that he believed the Standing Committees were being rendered in positive danger by the amount and the quality and character of the work referred to them. Everybody who had spoken in that debate had dwelt on the fact that they were creating a new crime, and they were deliberately proposing to make it a crime which would be recorded against children of tender years and be to their discredit afterwards that they should have indulged in the habit of cigarette-smoking, as to which they knew very little when they were induced by their companions to take to it for the first time. The Under-Secretary had referred to the inquiries held by Committees of the other House, and said he knew of medical men, and so on; but what he had failed to meet was this. It was asked by his noble friend that the clauses should be referred to a Select Committee for two reasons, one being, as he gave abundant evidence in his speech to show, that there was great ground for further consideration before a decision was arrived at, and the other that evidence could not be considered by the House itself on the Report stage. The Under-Secretary ignored the fact known to everybody that the Report stage of a Bill was almost an impossible one for the raising of new matter and for the making of proposals which frequently required, not only further consideration, but for their good presentment to the House detailed examination, which was only possible when those in favour or against could address the House more than once. He was astounded that this Government and the Party which supported them should be prepared, on such a very limited examination of the facts, to create a new crime out of what he believed was a very unwholesome practice, but nobody hitherto in his senses had thought that a child ought to be considered as a criminal because he happened to smoke a cigarette. In his opinion it was grandmotherly legislation of the worst possible kind, and he agreed with the hon. Member for Sleaford when he said that if they wanted to improve the morality of the younger generation they would not do it by legislation of that kind. They would not only not improve it, but they would do something worse. They would undermine their strength of character if they taught them that by indulging in this practice they were making themselves criminals, when they ought to teach them to follow the precepts and examples of those older than themselves and avoid such practices, which they were told on good authority were very injurious ; but he was bound to say that, notwithstanding the fact that a large number of boys were to be seen smoking cigarettes, he had not come across any evidence—and he did not know where the doctors got it from—to prove that there was any sign amongst our men of a deterioration of strength as a consequence of this habit. However that might be, he believed there was abundant evidence to show that they could deal with it effectively without making it a crime. There would be no chance for the consideration of an alternative proposal on the F and if his noble friend went he should certainly support. He believed the Motion was in the mind of the mass of the people of in regard to whom he thought it was unfair that the House should make a declaration of this kind which had not been made either in the House or in the consideration which it was now justified.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL, said the new clause on the subject of overlying was one which was moved as the outcome of a very long discussion on the subject of the Committee upstairs in substitution for a clause which found a place in the Bill on its first introduction. There were every year about 1,600 deaths of infants from this cause in England and Wales, and it was impossible for the State altogether to ignore this terrible rate of mortality. That admirable Society, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, had long urged that legislation should be passed on this subject, and they found the Coroners throughout the country repeatedly calling attention to the grave rate of mortality among infants due to this cause and appealing to Parliament for law in regard to it. The hon. Member for Portsmouth last year introduced a Bill having this as one of its chief objects. The clause as it originally stood made overlying an offence under all circumstances, and it was punishable by a fine of £10, but if the parent or other person who was responsible could be proved to be under the influence of drink at the time, then the penalty was increased. The Committee upstairs deliberated at great length on the subject, and it was generally of opinion that a clause of that character was somewhat too harsh. Overlying was regarded as usually an accidental occurrence, for which no real blame could be attached to the parent. It was thought, that, although it might be desirable that parents should not take their infants to sleep in the same bed with them; they must face the conditions as they were and realise that great numbers did so. Personally he rather doubted whether it was necessary for this custom to continue. In Germany, which had a poorer population on the whole and a colder climate, overlying was regarded as an offence, and the result had been that within the last few years the deaths from this cause had almost disappeared; they had been reduced to the most minute proportions, and what was possible there ought not to be impossible here. However that might be, he felt it his duty to fall in with the generally expressed desire of the Committee. At the same time, hon. Members on the Committee felt that where it could be proved that the overlying was due to the drunkenness of the parents it was impossible for the law to close its eyes to the circumstances. There were some remarkable figures which indicated that these deaths added to the heavy toll taken by the drinking evil in this country. The Registrar-General's figures showed that the deaths from this cause were twice as numerous on Saturday nights as on other nights in the week. Further, the Medical Officer for the County of London had sent him some figures covering the period 1901-1907, showing that these deaths were 50 per cent. more frequent in weeks in which there were bank holidays than in other weeks, and the House could draw its own conclusions from that fact. The existing law permitted the parent to go home in a state of incapable intoxication, to lie on the infant and smother it to death, and in practice there was no means for imposing any penalty in such circumstances. In 1906, in England and Wales there were 1,453 inquests on infants suffocated, and only one verdict of manslaughter was returned by a coroner's jury. The present law was inadequate, because where it applied at all it was too harsh, and the juries would not permit persons to be tried for manslaughter on this charge, nor would the juries in the Assize Courts condemn them. It was the wish of the Government to impose a new penalty of a lighter kind, and that was the purpose for which he now begged to move.

New clause—

"Where it is proved that the death of an infant under three years of age was caused by suffocation (not being suffocation caused by disease or the presence of any foreign body in the throat or air-passages of the infant) whilst the infant was in bed with some other person over sixteen years of age, and that that other person was at the time of going to bed under the influence of drink, that other person shall be deemed to have neglected the infant in a manner likely to cause injury to its health within the meaning of this part of this Act."—
(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the clause be read a second time."

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) said that, as the Under-Secretary had stated, they had had very considerable discussion on this question in Grand Committee, and he was one of those who thought the clause as originally drafted contained a very great hardship on the poorer classes, and he added his voice and influence in favour of the reduction of the penalty which the original Bill proposed. He thought the hon. Gentleman, after discussion upstairs, promised to meet them on the point, and he thought those who were on the Grand Committee practically agreed to accept a clause providing that it should be limited, as this was limited, who took their children to them and overlay them while under the influence of drink. Whether the clause in working ought to be limited to habitual drinkers or to a mother under the influence of drink was a question. He considered the clause proposed by the Under-Secretary was a great improvement on the clause originally introduced. For those reasons he should support the clause.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, S.W.) said that, as he understood the clause, it was an offence at which this clause should only be dealt with under the present law on a charge of manslaughter. He thought the necessity for this clause was very properly recognized, as the juries were very properly reluctant to convict upon so serious a charge in such cases. There might, however, be instances which were clearly manslaughter and nothing else. It was very important that they should clearly understand whether it was competent if this Bill passed to convict guilty persons for manslaughter, or whether the present law would remain, but the new clause would, to a great extent, supersede it. It seemed to them they might be running the risk of a possible punishment for even an offence as manslaughter to be dealt with by a lighter punishment suggested by the clause.

MR. H. J. TENNANT (Barnes) pointed out that if a person committed an indictable offence it would be possible to proceed against him or her under ordinary law even if this clause was not passed.

SIR F. BANBURY drew attention to the latter portion of the clause which contained the words "to its health within the meaning of this part of the Act." "this part of the Act" were to be read with and applied to the clause. He thought the fear of the hon. friend the Member for Barnet was groundless. He desired to make a few remarks upon the clause. His right hon. friend had told that there was a general consensus of opinion on the Grand Committee in favour of making the overlying of children whilst under the influence of drink a crime, but it should not be overlooked that a great majority of these cases were accidental. It could not be alleged that overlying was done purposely. To bring a woman who had caused the death of her child in this way into Court in order to prove her innocence was a very harsh proceeding. He was glad that that proposal had been dropped and that the clause had been modified in the way suggested by the Under-Secretary. Who was going to prove that a person was under the influence of drink at the time of going to bed? In the case of an habitual drunkard what was now proposed might be a reasonable provision which could be enforced, but personally he objected to all this kind of legislation if it could not be enforced. No good object could be gained by bringing in a large quantity of Bills, and going to the country and asking the electors to look at the number of Bills the Government had passed. They wanted measures which could be put into force when passed. This was a proposal which they could not enforce. How could they prove that a parent was under the influence of drink at the moment of going to bed? People did not remain under the influence of drink forever, and the length of time a person could be considered under the influence of drink depended very largely upon his state of health and upon the quantity of drink he had consumed. Some people who might be said to be under the influence of drink might be all right after an hour's sleep. Take, for example, the case of a woman who took three glasses of beer and went to bed at ten o'clock. She might overlie her child in the following morning, and how were they going to prove that she was under the influence of drink at the time the offence was committed? This proposal would undoubtedly inflict a very great hardship upon the working classes. He could understand such a proposal being applied to habitual drunkards. There were very few people indeed in this world who had not been slightly under the influence of drink once in their lives. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Simply because an unfortunate woman for once in a way took a little too much to drink and to her great sorrow and regret smothered her child she was to be haled before a Court of law, and rendered herself liable to three months' imprisonment with hard labour. She rendered herself liable to be brought before a Court of law upon a charge of having wilfully taken the life of her offspring owing to being in an inebriated state. He was rather sorry that his right hon. friend below him had committed himself to the clause. He agreed that the proposal now under discussion was better than the original clause, but he nevertheless hoped that the Government would not insist upon its being adopted, because it would inflict a great hardship upon innocent people. There might be cases where this kind of thing was deliberately done, and three months' hard labour was not severe enough. The ordinary law should be allowed to take its course. It had been said that the ordinary law would take its course, but the fact should not be overlooked that the tendency of the jury would be to inflict punishment under this clause and not under the ordinary law. He hoped the Government would not press the point.

MR. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth) said that some time ago he brought in a Bill dealing with this subject on behalf of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Coroners' Society, and the British Medical Association. That Bill was brought forward on account of the large number of deaths which were continually occurring in connection with this question. He was a coroner himself, and had dealt with hundreds of these cases. Perhaps he would be allowed to say that from time to time he had felt very much grieved when these cases came before him, because he was unable to do anything to save the lives of those poor little children. The cause was a preventable one, and they ought to try and stop this kind of thing. He thought they would be able to stop it very largely by the adoption of this clause. Personally, he was sorry the larger measure would not be placed upon the Statute-book. He did not think the public would object to the passing of a clause which dealt only with the case of children who died through the neglect of their parents whilst under the influence of drink. If a parent went to bed under the influence of drink and a child lost its life through overlaying, that parent ought to be called upon to answer for that offence. The hon. Member opposite had said: "Why don't you bring up a charge of manslaughter?" In a long experience extending over thirty years he had never heard of a conviction for manslaughter under those circumstances. It was very difficult to prove gross and culpable negligence, and he questioned whether any conviction in which that had been proved had taken place during his time. A measure of this kind would not prevent the charge of manslaughter being put forward where it could be shown to be a very serious case. If a child died in this way they could still prefer a charge that the child had undergone unnecessary suffering, and the parent could be proceeded against as having caused the child unnecessary suffering. It was not a small offence to cause the loss of the life of a child through carelessness and negligence on the part of the mother. With regard to the suggestion that the proposal should apply only to habitual drunkards, he did not think that even the hon. Baronet opposite, who was always very clever in his argument, would support that proposition. Everyone was aware that infant mortality was high enough as it was, and if by the passing of this measure they were able to confer a great benefit on infants they ought to pass it. He hoped it would bring about the saving of a great number of lives.

SIR HENRY KIMBER (Wandsworth) said that this was a clause which might fairly be inserted in the Bill, provided it did not save delinquents in serious cases from being proceeded against on the greater charge of manslaughter, to which, under the ordinary law, they were liable. Notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Portsmouth had just said in his interesting speech, he ventured to say that that charge could not be brought under this Bill. In Clause 14 and also in Clause 15, there was a very proper proviso that in the case of offences under those clauses the operation of the ordinary laws by indictment should be avoided. If the Under-Secretary of the Home Department would be good enough to put a similar proviso at the end of the clause to save in serious cases of indictment for manslaughter or for murder, he thought the clause would be unobjectionable.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr. CHERRY, Lincoln) said the hon. Member's suggestion appeared to be unobjectionable with respect to the clause. He thought it would be in grave cases, to charge with manslaughter. He would say that under the Interpretation Act, 1889 it was definitely provided that any acts or omissions constituting an offence under a particular statute or under the ordinary law, it was to proceed in every case either under the statute or under the ordinary law provided that the offence could not be prosecuted by the same act. If a person was charged under a section, he or she might be proceeded against either under the section or under the ordinary law in a grave case, for manslaughter.

LORD R. CECIL indicated assent.

MR. CHERRY said the hon. Member shook his head, but he could not say that that was so. The hon. Member would consider the matter at a later stage and the subsequent stages would take place.

SIR HENRY KIMBER: I would like to know why is it necessary in Clause 14 to insert a special proviso?

MR. CHERRY said he would say that proviso when they came to it. He did not think it was necessary, but it would do no harm. The hon. Member would consider the matter at a later stage, and if he went to another place, and if he said to them that a proviso was necessary, they would deal with it. The great object of the new clause was that a charge might be proceeded against notwithstanding that the person might be summarily convicted. Jurors take the serious view that in the case of manslaughter, and the very serious from one point of view, for offenders escaped punishment altogether. If they allowed this to be an offence which the magistrates could deal with summarily, they enabled slight penalties to be imposed, which would check the evil.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) said it appeared to him that the Under-Secretary in explaining this clause had shown that the provisions proposed to insert in the Bill were inadequate. The hon. Gentleman did not give any statistics to show what proportion of the 1,500 children whose lives were lost every year were lost as the result of intemperance. The hon. Gentleman was most destructive to his own clause in his reference to the deaths in Germany. Whereas in Germany these deaths were very numerous years ago, they had now almost disappeared. Did the hon. Gentleman think that this new clause, dealing as it did with drunkenness alone, was going materially to reduce the appalling number of fatalities of infants? Why did not the hon. Gentleman stick to his guns and retain in the Bill the clause which was in it when the measure was introduced? In the new clause they had very little prospect of the evil's disappearing—very little prospect indeed of its being affected at all, except in the case of those who were proved at the time of going to bed to be in a state of intoxication. They might be absolutely sober at the time of the overlying of the child. The drunkenness might have passed away, and the sleep following the drunkenness might be the absolute cause of the overlying. It seemed to him that the hon. Gentleman need hardly have troubled to move the new clause. It really was trifling with the whole matter. He deeply regretted that the hon. Gentleman had not seen his way to keep in the Bill the original clause which said—

"If any person causes the death of an infant under the age of three years by overlying it, that person shall on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds, or, if the Court is satisfied from the evidence that the person who caused the death was under the influence of drink at the time, to a fine not exceeding twenty-five pounds, or alternatively in default of payment of such fine, or in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding three months."

That appeared to him to be a clause which would have been likely to reduce the evil.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not think the Attorney-General for Ireland appreciated the point which had been raised with reference to the drafting of the clause. The point was that some hon. Members were afraid that the effect of the new clause would be to make it compulsory in all cases where an infant was suffocated, and the person causing the suffocation had gone to bed under the influence of drink, that the person should be convicted not of manslaughter, but of neglect of the child. It was merely a question of drafting, and not a question of the Interpretation Act at all. The new clause took away all other offences and made it the duty of the Court to convict of the offence described in the clause, and that alone. Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Government draughtsman considered the clause from that point of view, and were they satisfied that that was not likely to be the effect of it? Why had not this offence been described as one of cruelty, as in certain other cases under Section 12? That was also a drafting point which he hoped the Government would consider.

MR. CHERRY did not think that any difficulty arose in this matter. The new clause could not in any way prevent a prosecution under any other Act, because neglect in itself was an element in manslaughter just as much as in the statutory offence created by this Act. The words in the new clause were "shall be deemed to have neglected the infant," and, for whatever purpose, neglect might be the material issue. He assured the noble Lord that the Government would have the point considered most carefully, and if any real difficulty was likely to arise they would in another place make any Amendment that might be necessary.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS (Manchester, N.W.) said that the gravamen of the charge was that the person was under the influence of drink at the time at which the accident took place. But it was quite possible that the woman might have gone to bed at ten o'clock under to do with the child, who might be accidentally overlaid by the wife later on, and yet the husband was to be made liable for the death of the child. It was a reductio ad absurdum, and unless these words were put in the case might happen. An hon. Member had said that there was some method by which the wife could arrange not to overlaid the child. He would take his word that it was so, but at the same time he thought that if it was, they should have heard of it before. It amounted to this, that if a husband came to bed the worse for drink and had nothing to do with the overlying at all, yet, unless the Government accepted this Amendment, he would be liable to be taken before the justices and convicted. He pressed the Government very strongly on this subject, although he had supported them by his silence as far as he could, as the most effective way of doing so. The intention of the Government, he took it, was simply to punish the people who went to bed the worse for drink and thereby caused injury to the child, and not by putting these words in to make the magistrates find contrary to the facts or judges to direct juries in a way in which no judge should have to direct them. They were making a great change by this Bill, and an hon. Member had pointed out in an eloquent speech the great difficulty he had found in getting juries to convict women under these circumstances. They were taking away from the women the safeguard of a jury which they enjoyed at the present time, and making them liable to be dealt with by the magistrates; therefore, it was more important that they should make it absolutely clear what the offence was, and that it should be put in black and white in the Bill that it was only the person who caused the death of a child who should be punished for it. The Court should find out whether it was the case that the death of the child was caused by a drunken person, but they were entitled to infer from this clause that the fact that a drunken person was in bed with a child which was suffocated caused its death, unless these words were inserted.

MR. CHERRY thought there would be a great deal in the remarks of the hon.

Mr. Rawlinson.

Gentleman if the effect of the clause was to make the offence manslaughter then one must prove that the cause of the child's death was negligence. That this clause provided, however, that the person who had caused the child to go to bed under the influence of drink should be deemed to have caused the child in a manner likely to be injurious to its health. That was not manslaughter and they did not introduce any amendments of manslaughter. His Lordship had pointed out that they had tried to cut down this offence, but they had failed to cut down the offence of manslaughter and if it could be proved that the drunkenness was the cause of the death then the offence of manslaughter would be charged. But they had failed to do something which would be necessary to cause injury to health, and it was a matter of fact whether a person was drunk to bed so as to neglect the child in such a manner. That was the effect of the clause which otherwise would be necessary, because they did not intend to punish a person who had caused or contrived the death of the child.

SIR F. BANBURY said that the Member for the Radcliffe Division in Lancashire contended that no jury would convict anybody because he went to bed drunk if there was another, who was sober, coming in when the child died. He would, however, draw the attention of the hon. Member to the remarks of the Attorney General for Ireland, who said that that was not what the Government was to punish. It was not who went to bed drunk, but a child died from that cause or not.

MR. CHERRY: Whether proved that the child dies from or not.

SIR F. BANBURY said whole of their point. The for Radcliffe said that a pers be punished for going to be he must see that that would of the clause which said—

" " Whilst the infant was in other person over sixteen years that other person was at the ti bed under the influence of dri person shall be deemed to have neglected the infant in a manner likely to cause injury to its health."

Unless these words were inserted the mother might go to bed with the infant under the influence of drink; she might be sober at six or seven o'clock in the morning when the accident happened, or the husband might come to bed sober and by accident overlie the infant, but the effect of this would be that the mother would be liable to a penalty of three months' imprisonment, because when she went to bed she was slightly under the influence of drink, and nobody would have any alternative but to say that the jury should convict because the clause said that the other person must be deemed to have neglected the infant in a manner likely to cause injury to its health. Therefore, if they could once prove that the mother went to bed under the influence of liquor at eight o'clock in the evening she would be deemed to be guilty of an offence at six or seven o'clock in the morning. He did not think that even this House of Commons would wish to make her punishable under those circumstances. He therefore hoped the Amendment would be pressed to a division, and that they would have the support of the hon. Member for the Radcliffe Division.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) moved a new clause providing that in all cases where children were brought before a Court charged with an offence which rendered them liable to be sent to an industrial school, it should be the duty of the Court to give notice in writing to the parent or guardian of such child of the powers which might be exercised by the managers of the certified school in the event of a detention order being made in respect of such child. He had put this clause down at the request of the London County Council because it was apparent to those responsible for the administration of the Industrial Schools Act that there was a very great amount of ignorance among the parents as to the very stringent powers vested in the managers. The new clause was not quite in the form it was intended to be, but if the House agreed to the principle and gave it a Second Reading he proposed to move an Amendment to make it run as follows: "Where a child or young person is brought before a Court charged with an offence which renders it liable to be committed," etc. There were two classes of parents which this new clause affected. There were parents who, though careless of their children, were not but who were quite willing to let the State to take the responsibility of their children in these schools, and it might sometimes happen that more than half of such parents was admitted to industrial schools, and it might sometimes happen by the parents having a knowledge of the excellent education given at these schools that it was better for their children to be educated there and taught trades than that the child should be educated in public elementary schools. There could be no doubt. There was a large number of parents who were too anxious to get their children into industrial schools. This year there were 10,000 children in which children were admitted to industrial schools under Section 16 of the Act, in which children were charged with being out of school and not receiving education at the industrial schools at about £21 per head, and it was desirable to prevent children from going to the schools unless it was necessary. The object of the clause was that the parent should be made aware of the real state of the law should be made to realise that in sending his child to one of these schools he forfeited all control over him, and that the managers of the school were at liberty to apprentice the child or dispose of him by means of emigration without consulting the parent. There were neglectful parents who still had some affection for their children who would under those circumstances do their best to prevent their child being brought up to be sent to these schools. There was another class of parents who had a directly harmful influence on their children. It was often found that whilst children were in the schools their parents came down and interfered with them, and that frequently the managers had to send these children away to other schools, sometimes as far away as Manchester, in order to remove them from the influence of their parents. Then there was the tramp or criminal parent who regarded the education given as a valuable asset of which they were quite ready to take advantage when the child arrived at a wage-earning age. It frequently happened that when a child was apprenticed out its parents tramped down, sometimes as far as Wales, and told the child tales of hardships, or lured him away with a tale of higher wages to be obtained elsewhere. It was important that these parents should realise that they were liable to a fine or imprisonment if they interfered in any way with their children. He hoped the Government would accept the clause he now begged to move.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS formally seconded.

New clause—

"Where a child or young person is charged or brought before a Court with the intention of being committed to a certified school it shall be the duty of the Court to give notice in writing to the parent or guardian of such child or young person of the powers which may be exercised by the managers of the certified school in the event of a detention order being made in respect of such child or young person."—(Mr. Guinness.)

Brought up, and read a first time.

Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL pointed out that the object of this new clause was that the parents of children brought before a Court should have information as to what the control by the managers of certified schools meant. The hon. Member had quoted one class of case which he himself did not think was quite relevant. That case was of the parent who wished to get his son into an industrial school, and who knew too much rather than too little, and who was only too eager to obtain the advantage given at the cost of the State. That was a case which need not be taken into consideration. But there was the case of parents who, under Clause 16 of the old Act and the corresponding clause of this Bill, brought their children before a Court in order to get them into these schools, but who, he thought, did not always fully realise what they were doing. They thought their child would be punished by being sent to a school for a time, and then they could get him again when they pleased, and were not to be deprived of his services as a wage-earner till, perhaps, the age of sixteen. That was certainly a case which ought to be met. Then there was the drunken parent who had not understood that the child had been taken from his control, and who came down to the school and sought to entice the child away. In that case, also, something might be done, but not on these lines. The clause, as it appeared on the Paper or as it was proposed to be amended by the hon. Member, was not workable. No child ever came before a Court with the intention of being committed to a certified school. The intention might be in the mind of the Court or the persons bringing the child, but it was impossible to say what course was to be taken until all the evidence was before the Court and the inquiry had taken place. They would have to make inquiry in order to see whether it was a suitable case in which to send the child to an industrial school. The hon. Member proposed by his clause that whenever a child was charged before the Court, if it was an offence rendering him liable to be sent to an industrial or reformatory school, notice should be sent to the parent. But that would cover any charge, as, for instance, the riding a bicycle on the footpath; but if a boy below the age of sixteen were charged with that offence, no one would dream of sending him to an industrial school, although technically he might legally be sent. It would be absurd to send a long-winded notice to the parent and terrify him by saying that if the boy was sent to a reformatory or industrial school he would be kept there possibly until the age of sixteen, and afterwards be under the supervision of the managers. The last time he was a spectator in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, a boy, a perfectly respectable telegraph boy, was charged with the not very grave offence of kicking a football in the street, and fined half-a-crown. It would be absurd in such a case if, as soon as a charge was made against a boy in such circumstances, his parents were to be served with such a formidable notice. He thought the House would recognise that the proposal was not practicable. Only 3,000 children were committed to reformatory schools every year. Out of the tens of thousands charged, there was only a small proportion for whom this clause was really necessary. He suggested to the House the acceptance of an Amendment which he was very ready to put down to Clause 59, which said that where a child was brought by his parent before the Court as being uncontrollable, and it was desired that he should be sent to an industrial school, the Court, if satisfied on inquiry that it was in the interests of the child, might order him to be sent to an industrial school. He thought words could be inserted making it clear that it should be fully explained to the parent, before action was taken, what it really meant for him and his child if the latter were sent to an industrial school. Secondly, in regard to the case of children who had been sent to an industrial or reformatory school, what steps should be taken to inform the parents as to the extent to which their position was abrogated? He did not think that was a duty which ought to fall on the Court. The Courts of Summary Jurisdiction were bodies kept busily engaged, and it was rather an unnecessary burden to impose upon them to require that they should send in every case a notice to this effect. He thought that it should be the duty of the managers, or possibly of the local authorities, in cases where children were committed to the schools. The Home Office would consider, in consultation per local authorities, the best form that might be drafted and used throughout the country for and take steps to provide that should be supplied to the local and local managers of schools and desire to use it. The clause on the Paper, was really not and he thought the course on the whole was the better.

MR. WALTER GUINNE
 explanation of the hon. Gent.
 leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WEDGWOOD (New Lyme) moved a new clause providing that if any person gave, or caused to be given, to any child under five, any intoxicating liquor upon the order of a medical practitioner, or in illness or other urgent case, on summary conviction, a fine not exceeding £3. He said a similar Amendment in 1891 and it had been lost by one perhaps because he had not made the case as strongly as he could now do. The objection was that the former Amendment in Committee there might be some poor woman who would give a child in a case of sickness measles, and might thereby be self liable to be fined. He thought the weight of that objection was met if it had amended the clause in the addition of the words "in case of sickness." He met the whole of the objection which had been raised before the Committee. Another point which was raised was that it would be difficult to obtain evidence of cases where it was given to children, and consequently be very difficult to obtain convictions. That, of course, was a very strong objection to the clause in general he should be extra careful to see that any legislation was capable of easy application; but he thought there were exceptions to be made in general rule, and these ex-particularly applicable in cases of cruelty to children. If hon. Members looked at the Bill they would find that throughout it there were cases where it would be difficult to obtain evidence and to secure convictions. That was part of the difficulty of dealing with cases of cruelty to children. For instance, there was the question of mental and moral damage to children made punishable under the Bill. In all these cases, dealing with children, there were bound to be cases when the greatest difficulty would be found in obtaining evidence and getting convictions. Besides, there were three important considerations to be taken into account relating to this particular clause. In the first place, the law and public opinion, as Mr. Albert Brassey had pointed out, were constantly acting and counteracting upon each other. No doubt public opinion now recognised that it was a bad thing to give alcohol to little children, and educated public opinion had caused the bringing forward of this clause. If the clause were passed into law, then the law itself would counteract again upon uneducated public opinion, and it would lead, not so much to prosecution, as to a more educated and more progressive form of public opinion. Another very important consideration should, too, modify the condemnation of the clause on the ground that it was difficult to obtain evidence. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it would not be necessary to bring cases before the police court at all. Police court proceedings would not be in the least necessary. The clause, if passed into law, would strengthen the hands of all sorts of different people who visited homes where children were given drink, and who were at present unable, he would not say to enforce their views, but to back them up even with arguments which carried weight. The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and district visitors, people who were so constantly increasing the sphere of their activity, would have their hands strengthened by the knowledge that the practice of giving gin to children to keep them quiet, and of giving sups of beer out of a sort of genial good-nature, was forbidden by law, and not merely discouraged or forbidden by the best medical evidence in the country. The fact of their being able to say that would strengthen their hands in the right direction. The third reason which seemed to him to carry some weight, and made the difficulty of obtaining evidence of minor importance, was that there were plenty of cases where even now the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children managed to get convictions, where children were given alcohol, but they had to do it in a roundabout way, and the decision depended on what views the magistrates might take of doubtful interpretations. They had to consider, in the first place, the bench before which the case would be brought, and they had also to work up side issues and get evidence upon them, instead of upon the direct question whether drink had been given to a child. There were plenty of cases where the Society had managed to save children from alcohol, but in every case by indirect methods. It was obviously bad legislation when one had to attain one's end by roundabout methods. If it had been done until now in a roundabout way, it was an improvement on the existing state of the law to make it direct and simple and easily understood by parents, by the National Society, and by the benches of magistrates. There was a genuine need for preventing the giving of alcohol to little children, and there would, he thought, be few people found to deny that medical opinion was unanimous on the question that alcohol could only be required for little children in cases of severe burns. But however that might be, there was no necessity to bring before the police court any parent who gave alcohol to children under the erroneous supposition that it was good for their health in cases of sickness. It was bad for a child's health to have alcohol given to it. There had been cases in which children had been actually killed by being given alcohol. That sort of thing should not be permitted. It was bad for the health of the children; it might cause the death of children; and in addition children were initiated at a ridiculously early age into habits which might cause the utter ruin of their lives. He begged the Under-Secretary for the Home Office to give his support, as he had done in Committee, to the clause.

Mr. Herbert Samuel,

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland), in seconding the Motion, said the House was anxious to protect children from being sent to public-houses to procure drink, and this clause sought to prevent parents or others from giving children drink. To his mind the latter evil was greater than the former. He had seen parents giving children drink in public-houses, and he had always felt that he would like to thrash such parents, but had refrained, of course, as that would have been taking the law into his own hands. It might be argued that there would be difficulty in getting a case against the parent. He cared not whether there was a case or not. He wanted the clause put in in order to be an intimation to parents that if they persisted in doing this they would be brought within the meshes of the law. He thought it would have a good moral effect, and from that point of view he was prepared to support the clause. An exception was made if the child was ill, and the advice of a doctor was taken. Every Member of the House, whether a temperance reformer or not, was bound to admit that strong drink would have a detrimental effect upon the health of the child. Inasmuch as the age was only five years he hoped the Under-Secretary would, at all events, agree to some modification along the lines of the clause. He supported it, on moral grounds alone, as an intimation to parents that if they would persist in doing this thing they could be prosecuted.

New clause—

"If any person give, or cause to be given, to any child under the age of five any intoxicating liquor, except upon the order of a fully-qualified medical practitioner or in case of sickness or other urgent case, he shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding three pounds."—(Mr. Wedgwood.)

Brought up, and read a first time.

Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) hoped the Under-Secretary would pause before he added another crime to the over-burdened Statute-book. He sympathised entirely with what his hon. friend had said as to the culpable character of giving liquor of tation to small children, but be something in the intent were being multiplied rega tention. When Lord Maca he believed held in great h cularly on that side of the called upon to put together in the definition of almost ev began by saying "whoever c Here they had abolished in tention had nothing wha with the offence. LORD R. CECIL earned the Government would not clause. He could not thin Member had considered the of the clause when he mov

hon. Member who had just spoken had alluded to several cases which it would be perfectly monstrous to treat as criminal. The mover and seconder had pointed out with great candour that the clause would not be effective, but it appeared to him that it was objectionable on several other grounds. What possible ground was there for saying it was a criminal offence to give a child intoxicating liquor when it was four years and eleven months, but not when it was five years and one month. The thing was an absurdity. If there was anything in the theory that intoxicating liquor was always necessarily a poison to all children under five, it was equally true of children under seven, and, indeed, of children probably much older. There was no medical support for the opinion that five was the age which finally settled the question whether or not alcohol was poison to human beings. It was not very long ago since medical opinion was very different on this point. It was only a few years ago that it was quite common for weakly children, when there was no question of sickness, to receive regularly as a medicine or a tonic, or an article of food, some form of alcohol. If that was a perfectly legitimate medical opinion a few years ago, it was an outrage that now the House of Commons should turn round and say it was a criminal offence. Under Clause 12 there was a very comprehensive enactment indeed. Negligence which caused unnecessary suffering or injury to a child's health was a criminal offence already, and if it could be proved that giving alcohol to a child was under the circumstances likely to be an injury to its health, it was already a criminal offence. Why should they go on and select this particular form of injudicious treatment of children and make it an additional offence? He could conceive no reason except the rather unreasoning hatred of alcohol which prevailed in the minds of some hon. Members opposite. Whatever might be the true view as to alcohol it would be a matter of the greatest possible regret if hon. Members insisted on making the Bill a vehicle for their particular fads on one particular question. He hoped the Government would not accept the Motion, and that if they did the House would reject it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Bath) said the number of children who were made drunk in this country was enormous. It was perfectly true that under a certain clause in the Bill, if it could be proved that anything given to the child was causing or was likely to cause injury, the parents could be punished, but it would have to be proved that the child was drunk before a conviction could be obtained. He could give a case in which an officer of the Children's Protection Society went to a house near Dublin, and in a room found two children, one five and the other three, both drunk. How had they been made drunk? By their father and mother, who wanted to keep them quiet while they went out. He had another case in which a father took his child, aged four, to a fair, where it was given such a large number of sips of whisky that it was seized with convulsions and died, the coroner's verdict being "Alcoholic poisoning given by mistake." He would like to raise the age not to five but to ten. He had a third case, where a tiny girl of seven was taken, perfectly innocently, by a friend of the family to a public-house. She was afterwards found in a bye-lane near the village, struggling along with her hands upraised, saying: "I am drunk! I am drunk!" These were not stories, they were facts. If small doses of laudanum were given to children, what an outcry there would be. Yet the effects were the same. It was time the House of Commons advanced along with medical opinion. Sir William Broadbent had said—

"Children should never know the taste of any alcoholic drink, and stimulants ought to be absolutely forbidden during school life."

Sir Thomas Barlow, who gave evidence before the Select Committee on Physical Deterioration, said—

"It is immensely difficult to give statistics, but it is easy to give illustrations. In a boy, aged about ten, whom I had under my observation for several weeks, there was well marked evidence of gin drinker's liver and abdominal dropsy."

He had for a long time carried to his father, who was a cabman, his daily meal, of which some spirit was one of the constituents. The cabman had given the boy little sips of spirit, and he had got to like it. This was an immensely important thing for the assets of the State, the children of the country. Those who were opposing the clause were doing so from very proper motives, and he believed they were quite as kind-hearted and sympathetic as himself towards children, but they were woefully mistaken in their opposition to anything which interfered with the liberty of the subject. There were two subjects, and the child was as much entitled to protection as the richest citizen. He knew these things went on. He thought they ought to give child life a chance of living free from poison, at any rate, up to the age of five years.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY said the hon. Member opposite appeared to him to have proved too much. He wished to point out that in all the cases cited by the hon. Member they could get a conviction under Clause 12. For purposes, therefore, of present debate they were considering only those cases where the administration of drink had not produced and was not likely to produce any ill effects. As regarded all the other cases where actual harm had been, or was likely to be produced, they would undoubtedly weaken the Bill by this clause. The Court would turn to this clause, and say it was evident that there was no intention of convicting under Clause 12, because here was a special clause dealing with the administering of drink. He hoped the House would pause before adopting such a clause as this. He wished to remind the House that Clause 12 applied not merely to cases of injury to health actually caused, but also to any act done which was likely to do such injury.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) suggested that the clause should not be pressed. He made the suggestion more particularly on account of the speech which had been made by the hon. Member for Bath. The hon. Member had used as illustrations cases where definite injury to the children was proved, and he was sure there was not a single hon. Member of the House who was not prepared to strengthen the law in any direction which ex-shown to be necessary for of punishing parents who the health of their children.

He did not agree that a principle of the new clause very drastic indeed. It pr

"If any person give, or cau-to any child under the age of five ing liquor, except upon the o-qualified medical practitioner sickness or other urgent cause summary conviction, be liable exceeding three pounds."

Who was going to prove cause, and who was a better the parent as to whether a law was required? The suggestion forward was unwise, and some of the best and kindest in the world. Under no would he give a vote for it.
He could quite understand health suffered through alcohol, they ought to be not only the parents, but who suggested the admission alcohol; but the idea that mother should be subjected punishment suggested in because she had given drop of stimulant to her absurd. Many of the best were considered most terrible did this. To contend that person dropped three drops into a teaspoon and administered a child he was to be fined most outrageous suggestion
"No, no." That was the the words "Except upon a fully qualified medical or in case of sickness." He going to prove that? The mother would be able to child was sick, and there proof of sickness. All that took her child to the public have to do was to declare given her child intoxicating she believed it was sick, would escape from the wrath of the clause. He quite the object which the mover had in view, and they were to do all they could to life. In his opinion this not secure the object aimed

Mr. Maclean.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs) contended that the case to which the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent had alluded would be amply safeguarded, and such cases as he had quoted would be quite outside the purview of the Bill. The giving of alcohol to children under five years of age was doing an immense injury by vitiating the taste of the child in after life. He agreed that the limit of five years was too low, and the mover of the Amendment was very moderate in putting it at that age. Five years was the school age for infants, and that was the reason this limit had been fixed upon. Hon. Members opposite had spoken as if everybody who had children were good parents, and as if all mothers were kind to their children. Later on they would come to the case of infant life protection, where they would find that children were under the care of many other people besides parents who were not always too anxious that the children in their charge should be well brought up. It was to protect the children against this particular class of people that a clause of this kind was necessary. The giving of alcohol to young children generally arose from ignorance and stupidity, and the intention was frequently to silence the child and enable it to sleep in a dosed condition in order that the parent might go out of the house for hours. That was not a right thing for anybody to do, and he thought they ought to bring to the notice of such people the knowledge that if they did that kind of thing they would be punished for it. He could not agree that this clause would do any harm to any well-intentioned parent. In this case their aim was to protect the interests of the children, and for that reason he thought this clause was necessary.

MR. LUPTON thought that this attempt to make a short cut to improve society would, in the long run, prove to be the longest way round. He considered that this was a piece of grandmotherly legislation. What was the use of the parent, the schoolmaster, and the parson, if the policeman was to be called upon to do all this kind of work? It seemed to him that the proposal would not accomplish the object they had in view. Within the lifetime of people now living a large number of persons had taught that alcohol was not in itself harmful, and in Spain and other countries they frequently gave children beer in order to make them strong. Temperance advocates had, however, succeeded in greatly advancing public opinion, and they were now proposing to cause a revulsion of feeling by proposing to make it an offence to give a child plum pudding with a little brandy sauce. This was a monstrous clause. It would be considered an offence at a wedding when drinking a toast to allow a child to drink a glass of wine. The mistake was having any wine at all upon such occasions. Even in the House of Commons hon. Members took wine, and until public opinion excluded wine from all these functions they ought not to make it an offence to administer intoxicating liquor to children in this way. He looked upon this proposal as an example of legislation gone mad.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS trusted the Under-Secretary would not agree to this clause. The hon. Gentleman in the speech he made upon the introduction of the Bill admitted that it did not go as far as many people desired on both sides of the House. He further stated that it was largely a consolidation Bill intended to pass by general consent. If the Government accepted clauses of this kind he thought they would find that the passage of their measure would be attended with considerable difficulty. He did not think that any of the arguments addressed to them by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House had proved that this clause was necessary. The hon. Member for Bath had quoted the opinion of an eminent doctor to show that it was undesirable to give alcohol to children. But why prevent a child having it at four years and eleven months, and not at five, six, or seven years? If they were afraid of giving alcohol to children at that age on account of the tendency it might have to make them drunkards in after life, surely they ought not to stop at five years of age. He thought that so far as regarded any good the change they would get all the good under the existing Clause 12. The hon. Member for Dumfries, who took great interest in these matters and had given a great deal of assistance in the Grand Committee upstairs, had protested against any idea being held that these words were aimed against a particular class of intoxicating liquors. If they were going to prevent the giving to children of intoxicating liquors because they were sometimes going to keep a child from crying, why not prevent the giving of other narcotics which were advertised under the name of patent medicines? If the hon. Gentleman succeeded in carrying the Second Reading of this clause, it would be their duty to move many Amendments of that character in order that the effect of the clause might be properly carried out, and in order that all narcotics might be forbidden to children. He thought they should all stand in the same category. If a child had been out in the wet and came in drenched, and if the parent put a few drops of alcohol into its hot water or hot milk, believing that it was a good thing to prevent sickness, there was nothing in the clause to prevent the parent under those circumstances from undergoing the penalty laid down by the clause. In that case the alcohol was only used as a preventive. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill not to accept this clause, which, if accepted, must lead to considerable discussion after it had passed the Second Reading.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not conceal his view that this question was one of the most difficult to decide that had arisen in the discussions on the Bill. There was no doubt an evil now prevalent in the abuse of alcohol in this connection. There could be no question that the constant giving of sips of alcohol to infants must affect their physique, and must in course of time be likely to give them a trained taste for that liquor. He did not think it was possible to deal with the case by means of the clause in this Bill which repeated the existing law in regard to cruelty to children. They had to prove that the parent had wilfully ill-treated the child. No one had more experience in this matter than the hon. Member for Bath, and he had told them that a Court of law would not convict under this section unless the child had been made intoxicated by alcohol administered. This matter was discussed in Committee, and after full consideration the clause proposed by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme was carried but by only one vote. It was not so much because the hon. Member had omitted to provide for cases of sickness, but because many hon. Members thought that they ought to be put on the Statute-book as they were not able fully to deal with every case. There was no doubt the difficulty in enforcing a clause of this kind would be very great. In private houses and public places no one might be able to enforce the law. The homes of the people he did not think would be able to deal with more than fifty that occurred. The hon. Member spoke of inspectors dropping in to find out what was being done, and of guardians of children who might give alcohol to children when inspected. It was urged in the Committee that it was most undesirable to place on the Statute-book clauses which were likely to become to some extent a dead letter. He gave weight to that consideration, which was a real and a serious one. The considerations on either side were fairly balanced, but on the whole he himself had liked to see a clause of this character in the Bill. He would strengthen the Bill as far as possible, and make it as more useful. This matter was a matter of principle for the House of Commons to decide, rather than for the Government to press upon the House one way or the other. This Bill was more important than, a Government might think, a House of Commons Bill. It was a measure in which many hon. Members on both sides of the House had taken the greatest interest, and the perfecting of which they had stinted aid. He had to remind the right hon. Gentleman of what he said, namely, that in his view the clause were put into the Bill would lead to prolonged discussion. Time was running on very fast, and he hoped hon. Members would have consideration in mind. The Government would leave the matter open.

House. It was really a matter which the House should decide for itself. For his own part, feeling personally that the clause was a good one, but at the same time that it might imperil the passage of the Bill and arouse further opposition, on a careful balance of the many conflicting considerations, he would feel himself compelled to vote against the clause.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) moved a new clause providing that in all cases where children were brought before a Court charged with an offence which rendered them liable to be sent to an industrial school, it should be the duty of the Court to give notice in writing to the parent or guardian of such child of the powers which might be exercised by the managers of the certified school in the event of a detention order being made in respect of such child. He had put this clause down at the request of the London County Council because it was apparent to those responsible for the administration of the Industrial Schools Act that there was a very great amount of ignorance among the parents as to the very stringent powers vested in the managers. The new clause was not quite in the form it was intended to be, but if the House agreed to the principle and gave it a Second Reading he proposed to move an Amendment to make it run as follows: "Where a child or young person is brought before a Court charged with an offence which renders it liable to be committed," etc. There were two classes of parents which this new clause affected. There were parents who, though careless and ignorant of their children, were not negligent but who were quite willing to leave the State to take the responsibility of educating their children in these schools. It often happened that more than half of such parents was admitted to industrial schools, and it might sometimes be the case by the parents having a knowledge of the excellent education given at these schools that it was better for their children to be educated there and taught a trade than that the child should be educated in public elementary schools. Of course there could be no doubt. There was a large number of parents who were too anxious to get their children into industrial schools. This year there were 10,000 children in which children were admitted to industrial schools under Section 16 of the Act, in which children were charged on their parents with being out of compulsory education at the industrial schools at about £21 per head, and it was not desirable to prevent children from going to the schools unless it was absolutely necessary. The object of the clause was that the parent should be made responsible of the real state of the law; should be made to realise that in sending his child to one of these schools he forfeited all control over him, and that the managers of the school were at liberty to apprentice the child or dispose of him by means of emigration without consulting the parent. There were neglectful parents who still had some affection for their children who would under those circumstances do their best to prevent their child being brought up to be sent to these schools. There was another class of parents who had a directly harmful influence on their children. It was often found that whilst children were in the schools their parents came down and interfered with them, and that frequently the managers had to send these children away to other schools, sometimes as far away as Manchester, in order to remove them from the influence of their parents. Then there was the tramp or criminal parent who regarded the education given as a valuable asset of which they were quite ready to take advantage when the child arrived at a wage-earning age. It frequently happened that when a child was apprenticed out its parents tramped down, sometimes as far as Wales, and told the child tales of hardships, or lured him away with a tale of higher wages to be obtained elsewhere. It was important that these parents should realise that they were liable to a fine or imprisonment if they interfered in any way with their children. He hoped the Government would accept the clause he now begged to move.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS formally seconded.

New clause—

"Where a child or young person is charged or brought before a Court with the intention of being committed to a certified school it shall be the duty of the Court to give notice in writing to the parent or guardian of such child or young person of the powers which may be exercised by the managers of the certified school in the event of a detention order being made in respect of such child or young person."—(Mr. Gwynne.)

Brought up, and read a first time.

Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL pointed out that the object of this new clause was that the parents of children brought before a Court should have information as to what the control by the managers of certified schools meant. The hon. Member had quoted one class of case which he himself did not think was quite relevant. That case was of the parent who wished to get his son into an industrial school, and who knew too much rather than too little, and who was only too eager to obtain the advantage given at the cost of the State. That was a case which need not be taken into consideration. But there was the case of parents who, under Clause 16 of the old Act and the corresponding clause of this Bill, brought their children before a Court in order to get them into these schools, but who, he thought, did not always fully realise what they were doing. They thought their child would be punished by being sent to a school for a time, and then they could get him again when they pleased, and were not to be deprived of his services as a wage-earner till, perhaps, the age of sixteen. That was certainly a case which ought to be met. Then there was the drunken parent who had not understood that the child had been taken from his control, and who came down to the school and sought to entice the child away. In that case, also, something might be done, but not on these lines. The clause, as it appeared on the Paper or as it was proposed to be amended by the hon. Member, was not workable. No child ever came before a Court with the intention of being committed to a certified school. The intention might be in the mind of the Court or the persons bringing the child, but it was impossible to say what course was to be taken until all the evidence was before the Court and the inquiry had taken place. They would have to make inquiry in order to see whether it was a suitable case in which to send the child to an industrial school. The hon. Member proposed by his clause that whenever a child was charged before the Court, if it was an offence rendering him liable to be sent to an industrial or reformatory school, notice should be sent to the parent. But that would cover any charge, as, for instance, the riding a bicycle on the footpath; but if a boy below the age of sixteen were charged with that offence, no one would dream of sending him to an industrial school, although technically he might legally be sent. It would be absurd to send a long-winded notice to the parent and terrify him by saying that if the boy was sent to a reformatory or industrial school he would be kept there possibly until the age of sixteen, and afterwards be under the supervision of the managers. The last time he was a spectator in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, a boy, a perfectly respectable telegraph boy, was charged with the not very grave offence of kicking a football in the street, and fined half-a-crown. It would be absurd in such a case if, as soon as a charge was made against a boy in such circumstances, his parents were to be served with such a formidable notice. He thought the House would recognise that the proposal was not practicable. Only 3,000 children were committed to reformatory schools every year. Out of the tens of thousands charged, there was only a small proportion for whom this clause was really necessary. He suggested to the House the acceptance of an Amendment which he was very ready to put down to Clause 59, which said that where a child was brought by his parent before the Court as being uncontrollable, and it was desired that he should be sent to an industrial school, the Court, if satisfied on inquiry that it was in the interests of the child, might order him to be sent to an industrial school. He thought words could be inserted making it clear that it should be fully explained to the parent, before action was taken, what it really meant for him and his child if the latter were sent to an industrial school. Secondly, in regard to the case of children who had been sent to an industrial or reformatory school, what steps should be taken to inform the parents as to the extent to which their position was abrogated? He did not think that was a duty which ought to fall on the Court. The Courts of Summary Jurisdiction were bodies kept busily engaged, and it was rather an unnecessary burden to impose upon them to require that they should send in every case a notice to this effect. He thought that it should be the duty of the managers, or possibly of the local authorities, in cases where children were committed to the schools. The Home Office would consider, in consultation perhaps with local authorities, the best form that might be drafted and used throughout the country for that purpose, and take steps to provide that should be supplied to the local and local managers of schools, if they desired to use it. The clause, as on the Paper, was really not so good, and he thought the course he had taken on the whole was the better one.

MR. WALTER GUINNESS
 explanation of the hon. Gentleman's leave to withdraw the Motion

Motion, by leave, withdrawn

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-on-Tyne) moved a new clause providing that if any person gave, or caused to be given, to any child under five, any intoxicating liquor, without the order of a fully qualified medical practitioner, or in case of sickness or other urgent cause, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding £3. He moved a similar Amendment in Clause 59, and it had been lost by one vote, perhaps because he had not done the case as strongly as he ought to have done. The objection was taken to the former Amendment in Committee, that there might be some poor woman who would give alcohol to a child in a case of sickness, and might thereby be self liable to be fined. He thought the weight of that objection was met if it had amended the clause by the addition of the words "in case of sickness." He thought that met the whole of the objection which had been raised before the Committee. Another point which was raised was that it would be very difficult to obtain evidence of cases where alcohol was given to children, and that consequently there would be very few convictions. That, of course, was a very strong objection to legislation in general, but he should be extremely anxious to see that any legislation was capable of easy and effective application; but he thought there were exceptions to be made in the general rule, and these exceptions

Mr. Herbert Samuel,

but he thought the noble Lord might include a number of highly indigestible substances, a list of which might be given in a schedule to the Bill. He thought, however, he might begin with beef and mutton which grateful and comforting to the adult stomach were poison to the little insides of children of tender years.

TELLERS FOR THE BILL
 Wedgwood and

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) moved to add after the words "intoxicating liquor" the words "within the meaning of the Intoxicating Liquors Act." He pointed out that at present they had only the words "intoxicating liquor," which might mean anything or nothing. It was true that intoxicating liquor was defined in the Intoxicating Liquors Act, but the definition would not be incorporated in this Bill unless this Amendment were made. Therefore, he was only carrying out the intentions of the movers of the clause and the House in moving it.

MR. RIDSDALE formally seconded.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, after the word 'liquors' to insert the words 'within the meaning of the Intoxicating Liquors Act.'"—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL thought his hon. friend would be well advised in accepting this Amendment in the proper form. There was not such an Act as the Intoxicating Liquors Act. The proper words would be "within the meaning of the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1906." Under the Inebriates Act the meaning of intoxicating liquors had been held to be wider and to cover other things besides alcoholic liquors

MR. PICKERSGILL, upon the motion of the moment, was unable to move it, or the words of the Under-Secretary were the correct words, but he would move the Amendment in the form suggested.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member will, then, withdraw his Amendment and move it in the new form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, after the word 'liquors' to insert the words 'within the meaning of the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1906.'"—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD R. CECIL asked the hon. member to consider carefully what he was doing. Surely the hon. member did not want the House to commit an offence to give a baby brandy, or what was more, in years gone by, a little port or sherry, the very best intention, but always given with the best in the world—but that it was an offence to give a baby an amount of narcotic drugs undiluted with soothing syrup. A large number of babies' lives were sacrificed by the giving of medicine containing narcotics.

*MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is now discussing the last Amendment.

LORD R. CECIL said he was only discussing the definition of intoxicating liquor. If "intoxicating liquor" was left without a definition it would include all these narcotic drugs. It was surely a most ridiculous thing to say that a person could poison a baby to any extent, so long as liquor which paid excise duty was not used. That was an absurd position to take up, and the House would be wise to reject this Amendment and leave the clause as it stood.

MR. RAWLINSON, speaking from recollection, thought that a better definition of intoxicating liquor would be found in the Inebriates Act than in the Licensing Acts. The question here was a question of deleterious alcohol, and that was better defined in the Inebriates Act, where the definition included certain noxious drugs as well as alcohol. He desired to emphasise the difference between the definition in the two cases. In the one case the definition was confined to liquor which had to pay excise duties, in the other it was more widely extended. It would raise again some part of the question raised on the previous Amendment as to whether the House thought alcohol was more deleterious than drugs. It was interesting to know that the fear of opium was not so great in the House as the fear of alcohol, but at the same time he ventured to submit that they ought to deal with the question of intoxicating liquor being given to a child, and not the question of whether it was an excisable liquor or otherwise.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire) said the discussion of the last few minutes had impressed him with the danger of the House drafting clauses as they went along. He objected altogether to this system of legislation. If intoxicating liquor was to be defined, it should be defined in the section. The fact had been overlooked that this Bill applied not merely to England, but also to Scotland and Ireland, and if the definition of the Licensing Acts were to be incorporated, they also would apply to Scotland and Ireland. For that reason he was inclined to favour the suggestion of the hon. Member opposite that the definition of the Inebriates Act which applied to England, Scotland and Ireland, should be taken. He protested against this method of legislation, which in his opinion would, in the long run, land Scotland and Ireland into considerable confusion in the administration of this Act.

MR. BOWLES thought the House was entitled to know what was the definition of intoxicating liquor. The House had passed an Amendment making it a crime to give a child any intoxicating liquor without a single hon. Member defining what he meant by intoxicating liquor. He joined with his hon. friend opposite in protesting against this system of legislation. They were asked to confine "intoxicating liquor" within the definition of the Licensing Acts. The Under-Secretary had referred to those Acts. Would the hon. Member say what was the definition.

*MR. CHERRY said the definition referred to in the Amendment occurred in the Licensing Act of 1872:—"Intoxicating liquor means spirits, wine, beer, porter, cider, perry, sweets, and any fermented, distilled, or spirituous liquor which cannot, according to any law for the time being in force, be legally sold without a licence from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

MR. BOWLES asked for an explanation of the word "sweets."

MR. CHERRY replied that as he understood, it was interpreted to mean English wines. The hon. Member should remember that this Amendment was not moved by the Government; it had been sprung upon the House, and if it were accepted, he promised that full consideration should be given to the matter in another place. If it were only a question of drafting, it would be dealt with.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth) said the question had been discussed entirely with reference to alcohol, but it must be within the knowledge of the hon. Members that light wine mixed in water was frequently given to children of four or five years of age, because in many places water could not safely be drunk. Claret or cider was considered safer. There was many a village in Devonshire where a man would not risk allowing his child to drink the local water. Members of the House had not thought, he confessed, that "intoxicating liquors" covered such things as elder wine or cowslip wine, or liquors of that sort, given to children at Christmas. The proposal was so utterly preposterous that the House should say that the clause could not be passed in its present form.

*MR. NAPIER (Kent, Faversham) suggested that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and that the Government should undertake to bring up a definition, when the Definition Clause was reached, to meet the case. Otherwise, they might go on discussing this matter for an interminable length of time without giving any real consideration to it.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that if his hon. friend would accept that course he would be very glad.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Certainly. I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RAWLINSON moved to amend the clause by inserting in line 3, after the words "medical practitioner," the words "or nurse."

Amendment moved—

"In line 3, after the word 'practitioner,' to insert the words 'or nurse.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. RAWLINSON moved to insert after the word "sickness," the words "or apprehended sickness." That would meet the case of the hon. Member below the gangway who had pointed out that a parent might give his child, under the age of five, alcohol in genuine apprehension of sickness. An example had been given by his right hon. friend. A child might come in exceedingly wet, and, fearing that it might catch cold, the mother might give it a certain amount of. Under those circumstances be "apprehended sickness." Member below the gangway had guilty to having committed the on some occasions, having given child three or four drops of because he "apprehended sickness" thought the alcohol would be in prevent it. He submitted Amendment which he proposed reasonable one.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 3, after the word 'sickness,' to insert the words 'or apprehended sickness.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WEDGWOOD said Member had stated his case and he would accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the words as amended, be added to the Bill."

LORD R. CECIL said he would call the House's attention to the Amendment which was proposed to be added to the Bill. The two Amendments which had just been accepted, were Amendments of which he himself entirely approved, but he did not know whether there was any legal definition of "nurse."

MR. RAWLINSON: "Fully qualified."

LORD R. CECIL said he did not know the words "fully qualified," and he did not know what they would mean. A nurse would be anyone who was in charge of the duty of nursing the child, and he was sure it would always be an order that it should be a nurse, because the alcohol would be given by the nurse. In the Amendment "apprehended sickness," it was proposed that anybody in charge of a child, whenever they apprehended sickness, would give the child liquor, which was undefined at present, and, he was sure, would certainly include alcohol.

things as well. Though he agreed that these Amendments were perfectly necessary in order to prevent the impossibility of working the Act, yet he thought their insertion must have shown the House how utterly impossible this legislation was, and he hoped that they would see their way not to accept the clause as amended.

Question put.

the extension of the Act was not displaced by any contrary evidence. Having regard to the serious amount of evil thus brought under their notice, they recommend that the provisions of the Infant Life Protection Act, 1897, should be extended to homes in which not more than one infant is kept in consideration of periodical payment."

That was the award of the Committee which was in the position of an arbitrator between two contending parties. The Standing Committee upstairs had willingly accepted that award, and without a division and with very little discussion the Government Amendments to bring in the one-child homes were accepted. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said nothing to show that the conclusion arrived at by the Standing Committee was wrong, and he trusted that the House would reject the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. RAWLINSON said he would formally move the next Amendment standing in his name on the Paper.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 8, to leave out the word 'seven,' and to insert the word 'five.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'seven' stand part of the clause."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that this Amendment stood much on the same footing as the previous one. The age had been left at five in the Bill because that was the limit in the Act of 1897. The point had been referred to the Select Committee which had unanimously reported after hearing the evidence that the age should be above five, and that was the reason why "seven" had been inserted.

Amendment negatived.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the next Amendment standing in his name dealt with the amount of information to be given. It had been urged by the Poor Law authorities that fuller information than that which was provided for by the Act of 1897 was necessary. It was known that sometimes these children ultimately came upon the Poor Law, and, therefore, it was necessary guardians should be able to trace where the persons legally liable for maintenance. On the other hand, it should be remembered that in inquisitorial these inquiries were harassing the inspection became greater was the temptation to make untrue statements. Several proposals were withdrawn because he had not time to consider the matter carefully. He had conferred with the Local Government Board. He had consulted the Government Board, and the amendments on the Paper had been taken down in consequence. He now proposed to omit the words "age, and date and place of birth," and to insert after the word "sex" in line 8 the words "and date and place of birth." He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 19, to leave out the words 'age and,'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question, "That the words 'age and date and place of birth' stand part of the Bill"—put, and agreed to.

Amendment—

"In page 1, line 19, after the word 'sex' insert the words 'and date and place of birth.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)—

Agreed to.

MR. RAWLINSON said that in the circumstances he did not propose to move his next Amendment. He wished to say, however, that the inquisitorial and the more harassing nature of the inquiries made the tendency to defeat the object of the Bill.

Amendments—

obligation to furnish periodical reports to the local authority.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel)—

Agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out subsection 4 of Clause 2. He understood that it was desired to give power to the local authorities, where children had been placed out to nurse by responsible societies, to allow the societies to visit and inspect for themselves instead of the local authority. That was distinctly a good provision, and it was provided for under the subsection which they had just passed. Consequently he did not see why it was necessary to have this subsection in. It gave to the local authority power to render the Act nugatory altogether, and they might decide against having an inspection of any home. It would not be necessary for them in that case to give any explanation of their conduct. They were now being asked to pass a Bill which was in the main a good one, and which was going to effect a considerable revolution in the child life of the country. In view of those facts, why should they give this enormous power to local authorities? Local authorities had not come out very well during the last few months, more especially boards of guardians. The recent scandals which had been disclosed were present to the minds of hon. Members, and he could not see why they should go further by allowing the local authorities to have absolute carte blanche in this matter. He hoped the Under-Secretary would be able to show that the arguments he had advanced were wrong, and if he could not do so this subsection ought to be omitted. He begged to move.

MR. RAWLINSON seconded.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 31, to leave out subsection (4) of Clause 2."—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL remarked that when the hon. Baronet made a proposal for the extension of inspection

he could not help drawing attention to the fact, for it was the first time such a remarkable circumstance had occurred during his experience of Parliament. He wished to point out, in the first instance, that the local authority had distinctly laid upon it the duty by Clause 2, subsection (1) of inspecting under all ordinary circumstances. They could not say by a stroke of the pen: "We will exempt all these homes in our district." The hon. Baronet said the local authorities might neglect their duty. He might say that he had been in communication with the Local Government Board on that point, and he understood that they would take steps administratively to see that this part of the Act did not become a dead letter. The Government would require the necessary information to be supplied to them in order to show that the Act was being properly administered. The hon. Baronet had said that this subsection was unnecessary because it was already covered by the proviso of subsection (2); but that only allowed the local authority to exempt nursed children where they had been put out to nurse by philanthropic societies. But there were many other cases to be dealt with. There was the case of the middle-class man who went to India and left a child in care of some friend, paying for its board and lodging. They did not want the machinery of this Bill for a case of that sort. Then there was the case of a widower who put his children out to nurse in his own neighbourhood, and in that instance they might not want inspection. It was quite reasonable to allow some latitude to local authorities to exempt cases from inspection. His next Amendment would safeguard the clause, because he proposed to insert words providing that this exemption might only be allowed in the case of homes "which appear to them to be so conducted that it is unnecessary that they should be visited." He thought those words met the very legitimate desire of his hon. friend who wished to draw as tightly as possible the inspection of these homes. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

LORD R. CECIL said it was very seldom that he differed from the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London, but he respectfully did so on this occasion. The Under-Secretary had referred to the Report of the Select Committee, and unquestionably some of those who sat on the Select Committee were very much impressed by certain arguments used in favour of not extending the Act to one-child homes. A part of the evidence which impressed him very much was that in a certain number of cases individual children were taken in from motives of affection, and that in those particular homes the home atmosphere was preserved in a way which should be encouraged. Granted the most perfect inspection in the world, they could not secure by inspection quite that atmosphere which would exist naturally in a certain number of homes, and once they discouraged people of that kind from taking in children they were doing an injury which no machinery or official arrangements could possibly, or altogether adequately, compensate. That was an argument which was pressed very strongly on the Select Committee, and it was in view of that evidence that they drew up the following clause in their Report—

“ They are, however, of opinion that some of the objections urged by the witnesses against extension deserve serious consideration. Your Committee believe there are a large number of these one-child cases, where the infant is received from motives of a real affection for children in general, or for some child, or parent, in particular. Where this element of a home atmosphere exists it is of vital importance that nothing should be done by Act of Parliament, or what would flow therefrom, to chill or impair it. On a careful review of this aspect of the case, your Committee are of opinion that some power should be given to the local authority to exempt, on such terms and conditions as it may think fit, any particular home in their district from inspection, or to make arrangements for any such inspection to be made by a properly constituted benevolent society if the local authority are satisfied that the interests of the child will be safeguarded.”

Personally he was exceedingly grateful to the Government for carrying out so fully as they had done by this subsection that paragraph in the Report of the Committee, and he hoped his hon. friend would not think it necessary to press the Amendment to a division. He was convinced that this subsection was one of the most valuable in the Bill.

MR. H. J. TENNANT said he with what had fallen from the Lord that there should be some of exempting those one-child in order not to imperil the atmosphere which one wanted encouraged as much as possible only doubt he had was whether authority was the proper authority to decide which homes should be inspected and which should not. He had his hon. friend the Under-Secretary made it his business to think the question whether the local authority was the right one to give the verdict would have felt more comfortable. His hon. friend had made himself or officials the arbiter which home should be exempted. There could be no doubt that some local authorities were very lax. He did not wish to give too much power or to increase their power nor did he wish that there should be things which they all deplored which this Bill was drafted to try to stop to. He would have liked to insert in the clause the words “the sanction of the Secretary of State or some words of that kind, to the local authorities up to the mark”

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) associated himself with the remarks of his hon. Member opposite. There was a strong reason for giving discretion to the local authority in this matter. There was, for example, the case of a child from India where the conditions of service were such as to render it necessary that the child should be looked after in this way. He knew of several cases where local authorities had opened—he would say not kindergartens but infant schools to which the children of people in the Indian service were sent. It was obvious that such children should be exempted. He thought means should be found in the Bill to give to the local authority the type of exemption which should fall within the exemption. He suggested to the Under-Secretary that subsection (4) might be amended by the insertion of the words “for the reasons recorded by them,” and that in each case of exemption they should be able to guard against the danger which had been referred to as possible where exemption was granted at the mere request of a person.

SIR F. BANBURY said he had not changed his opinion as to the multiplication of inspections. On the contrary the more he got the more convinced he was on a point. He agreed with the hon. Members who had expressed the opinion that the local authority was not the proper authority to deal with these cases. The local authority might exempt too many and another might wisely exempt none at all. There should be a general rule which would enforce the exemptions on similar terms all over the country. In deference to the arguments of the Under-Secretary he asked leave to withdraw the Amendment. He asked the hon. Gentleman to consider whether he could not make the Home Office instead of the local authority the authority for giving exemptions. The Home Secretary could arrange that there should be a consistent plan of all over the country.

Amendments—

In page 3, line 33, after the word 'district,' insert the words 'which appear to them to be conducted that it is unnecessary that they should be visited.' "

In page 3, line 36, after the word 'visit,' insert the words 'or examine.' "

In page 4, line 23, after the word 'who,' insert the words 'after being given an opportunity of being heard.' "—(Mr. Herbert Samuel)—

Agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out Clause 4. He said the clause empowered the local authority to fix the number of infants that might be kept in a dwelling in respect of which notice had been received. In his opinion the local authority was not the authority to fix the number. He did not say that the number should not be fixed, that a person should not be required, and that regulations should not be laid down as to the sanitary arrangements of the house in which the infants were kept. What he said was that the Home Office was the proper authority to make the regulations. If the local authorities were modelled on the lines of that of Birmingham he would not object, but they were not all so enlightened. Different localities might take different views, and it was surely desirable that the regulations should be made by a central authority with the view of securing something like uniformity. The number of cubic feet of air space required in one district for proper health was just the same in another district. He did not know why the local authorities were to have this power. The Bill was a long one, and it surely would have been possible for the hon. Gentleman to define the conditions under which infants might be kept. Under these circumstances he hoped the hon. Gentleman would consent to the omission of the clause. Any new clause that might be necessary to give the Home Office power in the matter could be inserted in another place.

"In page 4, line 27 to leave out Clause 4."
—(Sir Frederick Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said this was a clause which merely reproduced the existing law. He was bound to say that it would be a very difficult thing for a central Government Department to say how many infants should be kept in any particular house or cottage. Circumstances differed in different places. The number of infants that might be kept in a house would depend on the number of adults living there. A cottage might be so overcrowded with adults that no children should be kept there at all. There might be another cottage of the same size where, the conditions in regard to adult occupants being different, three or four children might be comfortably accommodated. It was impossible by a general rule laid down by a Government Department to deal with all these various circumstances. The hon. Baronet must remember that these homes were numbered by tens of thousands. The machinery of the central Government could not deal with these problems. It appeared to him, however, that the clause needed amendment, seeing that the Bill now extended to one-child homes. The clause said—

“It shall be the duty of the local authority to fix the number of infants under the age of seven years which may be kept. . . .”

It seemed to him to be unnecessary to make that a duty. He could not agree to omit the clause, but agreed that it might well be made optional.

SIR F. BANBURY suggested that if he withdrew his Motion to leave out the clause, the hon. Member might accept the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. and learned friend, the Member for Cambridge University. The clause would then run that the local authority might fix the number of infants under the age of five years which might be kept in a dwelling.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments—

“In page 4, line 27, to leave out the words ‘It shall be the duty of.’”—(Sir F. Banbury.)

“In page 4, line 27, after the word ‘authority’ to insert the word ‘may.’”—(Sir F. Banbury.)

“In page 4, line 38, after the word ‘immorality,’ to insert the words ‘criminal conduct.’”

“In page 5, line 4, after the word ‘apply,’ to insert the words ‘either to a justice or.’”

“In page 5, line 11, after the word ‘and,’ to insert the words ‘(a) If the order was made by a justice, the order may be enforced by the visitor or by any constable; and (b) if the order was made by the local authority.’”

“In page 5, line 34, after the word ‘directly,’ to insert the words ‘or indirectly,’”—(Mr Herbert Samuel.)—

Agreed to.

*MR. CHARLES CRAIG said he wished to propose an Amendment to Clause 11, which dealt with exemptions, by inserting after the word “purposes,” the words “or to any religious or charitable society which shall pay any person for keeping an infant, or the person so employed; provided that the society has appointed a person who shall visit, inspect, and report to the society on the state of such infant at least once in three months.” This Amendment was designed to protect the interest of such institutions as the Presbyterian Orphan Society and the Protestant Orphan Society—institutions which did a great deal of good work in the way of looking after orphans, not within homes and buildings maintained by them by employing other persons after the orphans. If these institutions came under the definition of “institutions” in this section his Amendment would not be necessary; but it was more than likely that the Presbyterian Orphan Society and the Protestant Orphan Society would not be considered as institutions for the protection of life within the meaning of the Bill. He hoped that the Amendment would be accepted. He thought it would hardly be against these societies if the conditions imposed by the eleven clauses were made optional for them. A system of exemptions similar to that laid down in the Bill had been in force from the inception of these institutions. He understood the clause, as it stood at present, these two institutions would be exempted under Section 11, and inspectors would have to be appointed individually by every Poor Law Union in the North of Ireland in which one of the societies were boarded out. He was of the fact that the inspectors of these societies’ inspectors had always been carried out carefully and satisfactorily. He thought it would be a great advantage to impose on them the burden of their inspectors approved of by the local authorities. Again, presumably these societies did not come under the provisions provided in Clause 11, even where an orphan was boarded out. He thought they should have to be subjected to the regulations contained in the Act. He submitted that that was quite unnecessary, since these associations existed for the purpose of providing for the boarding out of children being well looked after. He hoped that the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would be willing, at any rate, to provide that such institutions named could receive a certificate of some sort from the Local Government Board, or the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, that they were in compliance of a proper kind to be exempted from the regulations under the Act, thereupon they should be so exempted.

MR. NIELD seconded the Amendment, for which he said his hon. friend had made out a good case. The Amendment mentioned by the hon. Me obligation to furnish periodical reports to the local authority.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel)—

Agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out subsection 4 of Clause 2. He understood that it was desired to give power to the local authorities, where children had been placed out to nurse by responsible societies, to allow the societies to visit and inspect for themselves instead of the local authority. That was distinctly a good provision, and it was provided for under the subsection which they had just passed. Consequently he did not see why it was necessary to have this subsection in. Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 31, to leave out subsection (4) of Clause 2."—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL remarked that when the hon. Baronet made a proposal for the extension of inspection

he could not help drawing attention to the fact, for it was the first time such a remarkable circumstance had occurred during his experience of Parliament. He wished to point out, in the first instance, that the local authority had distinctly laid upon it the duty by Clause 2, subsection (1) of inspecting under all ordinary circumstances. They could not say by a stroke of the pen: "We will exempt all these homes in our district." The hon. Baronet said the local authorities might neglect their duty. He might say that he had been in communication with the Local Government Board on that point, and he understood that they would take steps administratively to see that this part of the Act did not become a dead letter. The Government would require the necessary information to be supplied to them in order to show that the Act was being properly administered. The hon. Baronet had said that this subsection was unnecessary because it was already covered by the proviso of subsection (2); but that only allowed the local authority to exempt nursed children where they had been put out to nurse by philanthropic societies. But there were many other cases to be dealt with. There was the case of the middle-class man who went to India and left a child in care of some friend, paying for its board and lodging. They did not want the machinery of this Bill for a case of that sort. Then there was the case of a widower who put his children out to nurse in his own neighbourhood, and in that instance they might not want inspection. It was quite reasonable to allow some latitude to local authorities to exempt cases from inspection. His next Amendment would safeguard the clause, because he proposed to insert words providing that this exemption might only be allowed in the case of homes "which appear to them to be so conducted that it is unnecessary that they should be visited." He thought those words met the very legitimate desire of his hon. friend who wished to draw as tightly as possible the inspection of these homes. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

LORD R. CECIL said it was very seldom that he differed from the hon. Baronet and were organised for the sake of the persons who managed them, who did not scruple to treat with neglect and even cruelty the children who came into their hands. They could not, in a Bill of this sort, exempt altogether any body which called itself a philanthropic or religious institution. He was bound to say also that it was improper that this exemption should go into this clause, because the latter dealt only with institutions in which the children were boarders.

MR. NIELD : It does not say so.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL : Yes, it does. The hon. Member went on to say that he thought that was the only interpretation of the words "Hospital, convalescent home or institution especially for the protection and care of infants, conducted in good faith for charitable or religious purposes."

*MR. CHARLES CRAIG thought there was a great deal of force in what the Under-Secretary had said, but he did not think that his objections applied to societies such as the two he had mentioned, and although a subsection of Clause 2 had been mentioned it left it to the local authority to deal with inspection.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said they might exempt all the homes of any particular society from being inspected.

*MR. CHARLES CRAIG said the hon. Member must remember that there were a great many of these local authorities. In his own county of Antrim there were six local authorities, and in the Northern counties of Ireland there were, taking them together, perhaps thirty or forty local authorities who would have to be consulted in the case of each of the two institutions he had named. It seemed hard that an institution of this sort should have to get exemption under this particular clause from thirty or forty local authorities. These institutions had been doing their work so well for so many years that it seemed unnecessary now to throw upon the local authority the duty of inspecting houses which were well inspected by these institutions at the present time. The hon. Member said that the production of the certificate was not included in the Amendment but he hoped he would see it accepted as it was. At all events he trusted he would accept the Amendment which provided the Local Government Board should give a certificate. He moved as an Amendment to the Bill to add : "and provided that no religious or charitable society obtained from the Local Government Board a certificate that it is a proper institution to be exempted from the provisions of this part of the Bill." That seemed to him to get over the difficulties raised by the hon. Member, and such well-known societies as he had mentioned would, he thought, be exempted at once by the Local Government Board in Ireland. He said to him that no possible harm would be done, whereas he felt that these restrictions on these two institutions and many others, they would rather than stimulate their authorities to begged to move.

SIR F. BANBURY said he would second the Amendment to the Bill. He was glad his hon. friend had moved it, because in regard to the Amendment he was rather taken by the arguments of the Under-Secretary which he felt were so cogent that he would vote for his hon. friend in regard to it because it was evident that many people who, under the interpretation of the words "charitable institutions," used the institutions as a means of carrying on their own living, and did not carry them on in the spirit in which they should be carried on. That was the argument of the Under-Secretary which he felt that it was so true that he was inclined to think he should not be obliged to desert his hon. friend. In addition he now proposed to move the Amendment to the Bill to get over the objections of the Under-Secretary. He had been contending during the evening that the Local Government Board or the Home Office was the authority to decide whether an institution should be exempted or not. There were no great numbers of charitable institutions which undertook the guardianship of children, and it would be perfectly easy for them to apply to the Local Government Board, and this would provide a uniform system all over the United Kingdom. Under these circumstances he hoped the hon. Gentleman who had shown a spirit of friendliness to reasonable Amendments from that side of the House would accept this one, which would in no kind of way interfere with the spirit of the Bill, and would render the task of the local authority easier. He was not enamoured of local authorities and would prefer that the matter should go to the Local Government Board who should decide once for all whether all over England, Scotland, and Ireland these associations should be exempted. He earnestly hoped that the Amendment of his hon. friend would be accepted.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"At the end, to add the words 'and provided that such religious or charitable society shall have obtained from the Local Government Board a certificate that it is a fit and proper institution to be exempted from the provisions of this part of this Act.'"—(Mr. Charles Craig.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added to the proposed Amendment."

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL thought the Amendment moved in this form required careful consideration. The hon. Member had not put it upon the Paper, and, therefore, there had been no opportunity of consulting the Local Government Board upon it. Nor could he say that that Department would welcome so difficult and invidious a duty as that of saying that one society should be exempt from the provisions of the Act and that another should not. If the hon. Member would be good enough to withdraw the Amendment now, as it could not be accepted without consultation with the Departments concerned not only in England but in Scotland and Ireland also, he would give it his consideration and deal with it, if necessary, in another place.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG, upon the undertaking of the hon. Gentleman, asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Proposed Amendment to the Bill, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS moved the rejection of Clause 13, for the purpose of asking the Under-Secretary whether on reflection he did not think that the penalty under this clause was a very stringent one and one which might fall very harshly on innocent persons. He had no sympathy with the professional beggar, or with those who hired children for the purpose of begging, but he had great sympathy with persons who might be affected by the other ten lines of the clause. The question he wished to ask was how the hon. Gentleman defined the word "allows." He assumed that he meant "wilfully allows." That was to say that the person having the custody, charge, or care, of the child was fully acquainted with the fact that the child started out to beg. Let him take a concrete illustration. Let the hon. Gentleman assume that there was a widow who kept herself and her two or three children by her needle. The children went out into the street to play, and without her knowledge solicited alms, by singing or playing or performing, and brought themselves under the terms of this clause. It struck him that it was a great hardship to inflict on the widow anything like the penalty of £25 or three months imprisonment. The woman in that case had no guilty knowledge that the children were out for the purpose of begging. Although subsection (2), to a certain extent qualified his objection he did not think it in any way removed it. His attention had been recently called to the latter part of the clause by one of the best known London police magistrates, who pointed out to him the complete ignorance of many persons charged with these offences, and who said it was all very well to say that they were given the opportunity to prove the contrary, but that they did not know what to do in order to prove the contrary, and that very few of them knew what was meant when they were asked to give evidence. All he wished was to be assured that this clause would not be applied in such a case as he had suggested. He wished the Government to be careful not to allow a clause of this sort to apply in any case to a poor woman or other person who had the custody of children, who had no place except the one room in which they lived and slept, and who had to go out in the streets to play. In such cases a penalty of this sort would be extremely harsh, and, therefore, he hoped the Under-Secretary would be able to assure him that it should not apply. He also hoped that in any case the hon. Gentleman would accept some Amendment to differentiate such cases. He would be satisfied if the hon. Gentleman inserted "wilfully." In such a case as he had mentioned where the children could not be under the eye of the person nominally in charge of them it would be a great hardship if the person under whose charge they were, who did not wilfully incite them to beg, was rendered liable to such a penalty as this. He begged to move.

"In page 9, line 13, to leave out Clause 13."—
(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

Question proposed, "That subsection (1) of Clause 13 stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL pointed out that subsection (1) of this clause was precisely the existing law, with the one exception that the age was raised from fourteen to sixteen in the case of boys, and that the penalties in this clause were precisely those of the Act of 1904 for this offence. He was quite sure that the law of 1904 was right, because it was passed when the right hon. Gentleman opposite was Home Secretary, and therefore charged with the supervision of legislation of this character. Subsection (2) was new, and showed what was meant by the word "allows," and also put the burden on the parent to prove that though the child was found in the street begging it was not the parents' fault. One of the great difficulties which was now felt in the working of the present Act upon this point was that, although it was well-known that a disreputable parent knew that his child was in the street begging, but he acquiesced in and profited by his doing, unless it could be clearly proved that the parent instructed or incited that child. If certain Courts would not convict, the Government had been strongly urged to insert subsection (2) and to shift the burden of proof on the parent. If subsections were deleted it would be extremely difficult to secure convictions in proper cases. After all, the parent was responsible for the custody of the child, and when a child was found in the street was shown to be there for that purpose, the burden of proof on the parent was not allowed to be shifted. For that purpose ought to be on the parent.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, South-West) thought the speech to which he had just listened was one that might have come from a strong Conservative hon. Gentleman's argument. He thought that because the Act of 1904 inflicted a penalty on a parent for allowing his child to be in the street, the House must be bound by that Act. No doubt he had been acted quite rightly and properly in passing that Act, yet, never thought this penalty of £25 was very harshly indeed, not one that induced their children to obtain money from the unwary, but one that was a part of the law and of what they had to do in order to escape this severe penalty. He, therefore, thought it was a penalty that was mitigated and that justice was done by the punishment of those who were responsible and in avoiding injury to those who were allowed their children out in the street to play.

MR. MACLEAN pointed out that the penalty in the Bill was the same as the penalty in the Act of 1904 but that the Act of 1889, both of which Acts were the result of the legislation of the same period, was quite opposite. It was delightful that this legislation was the result of the agreement of both the Parties in the House. The major position of children's work was due to the present Lord Chancellor who brought in the Act of 1904 and who also supported the Act of 1904. He was in regard to the point that a child was allowed to be in the street without parents, and was found begging, that the clause put the onus upon the institutions which undertook the guardianship of children, and it would be perfectly easy for them to apply to the Local Government Board, and this would provide a uniform system all over the United Kingdom. Under these circumstances he hoped the hon. Gentleman who had shown a spirit of friendliness to reasonable Amendments from that side of the House would accept this one, which would in no kind of way interfere with the spirit of the Bill, and would render the task of the local authority easier. He was not enamoured of local authorities and would prefer that the matter should go to the Local Government Board who should decide once for all whether all over England, Scotland, and Ireland these associations should be exempted. The woman in that case had no guilty knowledge that the children were out for the purpose of begging. Although subsection (2), to a certain extent qualified his objection he did not think it in any way removed it. His attention had been recently called to the latter part of the clause by one of the best known London police magistrates, who pointed out to him the complete ignorance of many persons charged with these offences, and who said it was all very well to say that they were given the opportunity to prove the contrary, but that they did not know what to do in order to prove the contrary, and that very few of them knew what was meant when they were asked to give evidence. All he wished was to be assured that this clause would not be applied in such a case as he had suggested. He that the child or young person was in any street, premises or place for any such purpose as aforesaid, and that the person charged allowed the child or young person to be in the street premises or place, he shall be presumed to have allowed him to be in the street, premises or place for that purpose unless the contrary is proved."

That was absolutely contrary to the principle of the English law. He challenged anyone to deny that it was one of the virtues of the English law that a man was taken to be innocent until proved to be guilty. Why should that principle be changed in this subsection? The Under-Secretary had already said that it was very difficult for the police to punish a person who they knew allowed a child to be in the street, because they could not absolutely prove that the parent or person in charge of the child had insisted on the child going into the street. He rather doubted that. He thought the police knew perfectly well whether people were in the habit of sending their children out. It was always difficult to prove a crime, and there must be many instances where there was no legal proof. That, however, was no argument for passing a clause which would inflict a great hardship upon people who really did not deserve any punishment. The age limit, it had to be remembered, had been increased to sixteen, and the clause would apply principally to the great cities. A boy of sixteen in London was no child. In nine cases out of ten he knew nearly as much on many subjects as any hon. Member in that House. It could not be said that a London boy of sixteen was a child, forced to do things against his wish. A widow who had to earn her own living might send her son, fifteen and three-quarters years of age, to a street where she had seen a notice "Boys wanted" in a shop window to see if he could get the situation. The boy might see a benevolent gentleman or lady and beg. Under this subsection the widow would be deemed to have sent the boy out to beg and be liable to a fine of £25 unless she could prove that she did not send him out to beg. How could she do that? Probably she would not know anything about his having begged, and how would she know when she sent him out that he was going to beg? This kind of legislation was certain great hardship on many innocent people. The hearts of hon. Members rather ran away with their kindly feeling was so great that they would not allow them to exercise their judgment, and see that by ending the Bill to remedy every evil under the sun they might be inflicting great hardship on many innocent people. He could not conceive that the House would pass such a clause to pass. He did not think it would do much good, because it would be people who made a living by sending their children out to beg, and when it was so difficult to prove, when they got over a provision of this kind they would never get the real principle. But they would inflict a very great hardship on a great number of innocent people, and believing that on reflection the House would leave it out of the clause, he had much pleasure in its omission.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire) said it was not too often that he came to eye with the hon. Baroness. In this case he felt constrained to say so. The Bill all through was an experiment, and they all desired that the main principle should be of protecting young persons that they were safeguarded as respectable citizens. But here, where, they had to draw the line, it was a matter of common sense that they drew it. He supposed that the particular subsection had been passed hurriedly. It seemed very loose. Surely a person might be a woman, but the person was a child, and where a widow had a child, they were classed under the guardianship of "himself." He must consider what the motives and responsibilities were. Still, under this subsection, presumed to be sending a child out to beg without permission, perhaps for some or innocent reason. The Bill always assumed to aim at fairness. It was assumed that a person was innocent until he was proved to be guilty. The poor mother or father would be guilty without its being show that they had not sent the child out to beg. So far as his own personal experience was concerned, he could most emphatically confirm the statements that over and over again inspectors of various kinds had the greatest possible difficulty in dealing with just that class of person to whom the right hon. Gentleman on the front Opposition bench had referred a little while ago, namely, the class of person who professionally sent out children to beg. He thought it was that class of person that this subsection was aimed at. For himself, after careful consideration with magistrates and others, and with police officials of very great experience, personally he was quite certain that if this clause passed in its present form a very great deal of good would be done in clearing the streets of children who were sent out by persons, not their fathers and mothers alone, who got quite a large livelihood out of the miseries of little children in our public thoroughfares.

MR. RAWLINSON desired to support the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment, and he thought that they could hardly have stronger evidence of the non-party character of this debate than the fact of his having submitted an Amendment to this very clause. To send out a child to receive money might be improper, but was it proper in such circumstances that a person should be liable to a penalty of £25, or three months' imprisonment? He submitted, without the slightest hesitation, that it was an excessive and ridiculous punishment, to pass upon such a person. It was so easy to excite prejudice against one who sent out a child for the purpose of making money out of him; it was so easy to appeal to sentiment, which, if he might say so with respect, frequently attracted that House as well as other audiences. But the subject should be looked at from the other side and from the point of view of the people who did this sort of thing. Where a father or mother was ill or in want of money, was there any very great harm at Christmas time in their sending the children out to sing carols and bring a little money into the family exchequer? He submitted that the case should be dealt with more equitably. He had very little sympathy with this class of legislation which made sentimental appeals to them to make things criminal offences because they disliked them. He would have great pleasure in supporting his hon. friend in his objection.

*SIR J. JARDINE (Roxburghshire) said there was such a thing as right sentiment, and recent legislation had endeavoured to prove to people that the proper place for children was in the school and not in the street singing or doing other things with the object of getting money. It was clear from the wording of the clause that £25 was the maximum fine. No doubt cases had occurred in which wicked people had been using children for the purpose of putting money into their own pockets, and not for the benefit of the children themselves. If an aggravated offence were proved, the magistrates would be justified in inflicting a high fine in order to take that money away from the person who had wrongfully gained it. The clause, however, did not impose such high penalty in ordinary cases, and he had no doubt from his own experience that magistrates would often let the offenders off with a fine of 10s. 6d. according to the circumstances knowing as they did that justice had to be tempered with mercy.

Amendment negatived.

SIR F. BANBURY moved the omission of subsection (2) of Clause 13. He said he rather disagreed with his right hon. friend so far as subsection (1) was concerned. He was rather inclined to support that subsection because it carried out the old principle of the English law that a man was innocent until proved to be guilty. They were, of course, all desirous of stopping people hiring young children and making a living out of their begging, but they ought to prove a person was guilty before they punished him. It ought to be assumed in this as in every other case that a person was innocent till he was proved to be guilty. This subsection did absolutely the reverse. It said that—“ If a person having the custody, charge, or care of a child or young person is charged with an offence under this section, and it is proved and left a child somewhat carelessly, and without taking what some magistrate might think reasonable precautions against the risk of the child getting burned or scalded, should be fined any sum up to £10. She could not find the money and would be sent to prison and the children would have to be provided for by the State. The section, although amended and improved was still crude, and was one which the House should not affirm.

MR. CARLILE, in seconding, said the clause as it stood seemed to deal only with one side of the dangers in connection with burning. One of the principal dangers was the inflammable nature of the clothing worn by young children, which was so frequently the cause of their being burned to death. The expression "open fire grate insufficiently protected" seemed to be very vague. A woman might be working in another room and she might leave the open fire grate carefully covered by an efficient guard which some other person might remove in her absence. The result might be that a young child left in the room was burned to death, and then the mother in the next room, unconscious of what had happened, was to be held responsible and liable to the penalties imposed by this clause. [Cries of "No, no."] It seemed to him that those facts ought to be carefully considered, and the position of a mother in those circumstances should be safeguarded against the interference of a third party. He also thought that some provision should be made for condemning the highly inflammable character of clothing worn by young children.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 9, to leave out Clause 14."—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that this clause was one to which the Government attached the greatest importance, and he regarded it as one of the most valuable features of the Bill.

Mr. Rawlinson.

It was a most necessary clause. There were in England and Wales every year over 1,400 cases of children being burned to death from unguarded fires, and the statistics disclosed only a small fraction of the suffering which attended this cause.

MR. CARLILE asked if the 1,400 were cases of unguarded fires.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said his recollection was that they were.

MR. GUINNESS asked if the clause included lamp accidents?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not think lamps were included in the clause. The statistical tables were not very complete. There were many cases of children severely burned and permanently disabled although not attended with fatal results. The coroners of the country were continually drawing attention to this. He quoted expressions of opinion on this subject from the coroners of Bromwich, Manchester, Liverpool, and Dublin, and, so far as one could judge from the expression of opinion, the clause was generally approved of. Cases might arise in which well-to-do persons whose children were burned to death would be prosecuted for not taking precautions of the kind mentioned in the clause. He did not think the clause was oppressive as applied to poor people. When the Bill was before the House he had displayed on the table a small lamp which could be bought for a shilling, and he said surely the saving of a child's life was worth a shilling. It was a strange thing to say that a person was not to leave a child alone in a room unprotected from fire without taking precautions of any sort and to be held in no way responsible if the child was burnt to death. The hon. member opposite said they were not introducing a novel principle in this Bill, that it was an unheard-of thing to provide that an act which was itself not criminal should become criminal if disaster followed. Although not a lawyer he could quote many instances of this kind. A

Amendment proposed—

"In page 9, line 24, to leave out subsection 2 of Clause 13."—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. CHERRY said the hon. Baronet would not be surprised that the Government could not accept the Amendment. It was quite true that according to the ordinary practice of the law a man was presumed to be innocent until he was proved guilty, but there were many cases under the existing law where, owing to the difficulty of formal proof of particular facts the onus of proof had been by legislation shifted to the accused, and this was a case of the kind. It had been done in the case of the adulteration of food, and of dealing with stolen property where the person in possession of stolen property was presumed to have stolen it unless he could explain where it came from. There were hundreds of instances where any person of ordinary knowledge would have no moral doubt whatsoever that the child had been begging with the sanction and knowledge of the parent and that the money which the child received went direct to the parent, but still the police would have an almost impossible task in proving knowledge of the fact that the child was begging. The object of the second subsection was really to make the first one workable. The common sense of magistrates might be relied on not to convict in cases where there was the slightest suggestion of innocence on the part of the person. Instances constantly occurred where a child was begging day after day. The knowledge of the parent might be very reasonably presumed, and the onus might be shifted on to him of showing that without his knowledge the begging took place. For these reasons he asked the House not to accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. RAWLINSON moved to omit Clause 14. It had been considerably amended in Committee, and it had been improved from his point of view by those Amendments. But, in spite of the Amendments, it was a clause which the House should not pass. It was entirely a new piece of legislation, and was wrong in principle and wrong in desirability. It was no offence to leave a child in a room with an unguarded fire or an unguarded kettle. It was only where the child was killed or suffered serious injury from being left in that position that it became an offence. The fact that the child was injured was in itself probably sufficient punishment for most careless people, and to impose a fine of £10 was rather an objectionable form of legislation. But one went a step further. If the child was killed there was already a remedy, the person in charge being guilty of manslaughter. It had slipped out from the hon. Member for Portsmouth, who spoke with experience as a coroner, that there was great difficulty in getting a jury to find a verdict of manslaughter against a mother. The object of the section was to remove the question from a jury and leave it to be dealt with by magistrates. He objected very much to that, and would much prefer the verdict of a jury who were much more likely to know the circumstances of the particular person and whether he was guilty of negligence, than a magistrate who might or might not have preconceived views on the point. The section was aimed solely against the ordinary poor person. It was an extraordinary thing that this Parliament certainly hit harder and more harshly against the working classes than probably any Parliament we had had for a long time, and that there was hardly anybody who could voice the feelings and expressions of that class. Their representatives were very rarely present on these occasions, and those who carried on these discussions were men like the hon. Member for Bath, whose wholeheartedness nobody doubted. He was afraid on this Bill he was in the position throughout of advocatus diaboli, for the real working classes of the country were so very little represented in that House—he did not mean the trade unionists, but the real people who worked, on whom obviously a great injustice was being inflicted. The clause simply hit poor persons. No rich person would be likely to be hit by a penalty of £10—it would be nothing at all to him—but it was a glaring injustice that a person who had gone out the clause applied to all householders. That was perfectly true, but what made it class legislation was not the enactment of the clause—that was an academic affair—but the penalty attached to it. How could the hon. Gentleman pretend that the effect of this clause was the same in the case of the rich man as in the case of the poor man? He did not mean “rich” as the word was often used, and as it was used the other day by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in describing multi-millionaires. How could it be said that a clause like this which imposed a fine of £10 was the same in the case of the rich man as in the case of a working-man?

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The clause does not impose a penalty of £10.

MR. WALTER LONG said he was not suggesting that a penalty of £10 would be imposed, but that the argument of his hon. friend behind him was correct that in the case of a penalty of 10s. or 5s. instead of £10 the burden on many of the people to whom the Act would apply would still be a great matter. The hon. Gentleman sought refuge in the fact that it was only a maximum penalty of £10. But supposing the magistrates reduced the penalty to 1s. that would add a burden to the ordinary small householder which might be felt a great deal more than a fine of £10 to a rich man. He thought that made the clause class legislation and nothing else. He himself believed that this was a kind of class legislation which was thoroughly bad. He believed that if it was true that parents were guilty of the gross neglect which the hon. Gentleman said they were guilty of, the proper, courageous, and honest course for Parliament to take was not to impose fines of this kind surrounded by all sorts of difficulties, but to alter the law in regard to manslaughter. If it was true as the hon. Gentleman had practically told the House, that children met their death through the neglect of their parents, let the offenders be convicted of manslaughter and sent to prison. He did not challenge the facts given by the hon. Gentleman, but until the penalty was made the same all round for rich and poor they could not escape the charge that this was class legislation pure and simple. He did not to say that this clause quite at its merits and the general underlying the Bill, was one unjust to poorer classes in this country.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that £10 is too severe a penalty and that it ought to be made manslaughter.

MR. WALTER LONG: I said it was of the kind.

MR. H. J. TENNANT said he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in the view he had adopted towards this clause. It seemed to him to be almost impossible to make laws for the prevention of accidents which should be equal in incidence as against rich and poor. The clause was absolutely equal in incidence. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten to read the clause which said that the fire-grate must be sufficiently protected, but that reasonable precautions must be taken against risk of fire. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would be the first person to say that the working classes were as responsible as the rich to protect their children against that risk. If they were going to protect the lives of those children, he followed that they must invent some means of doing so, and that the law must operate equally as against rich and poor. It had been said that the clause was heavier as against the poor, but he could not help that; it was the circumstances. He thought it was wrong to bring the point too much to say that it was class legislation. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested the removal of the stringency of the criminal law. He did not himself think that that would do. He thought that a penal clause of the kind proposed by this Bill would be more likely to make people take precautions for the protection of children than any other course they were likely to enact.

SIR F. BANBURY said the right hon. Gentleman opposite had said not class legislation. In his own house the hon. Member would have a fire-guard or a well-paid nurse, but in the house of a country labourer there would be no fire-guard. He had not seen the 1s. guard which had been referred to, but he did not think it would be efficient very long. If a 1s. guard was put in a labourer's cottage it would be broken almost immediately, and a labourer receiving 14s. a week would not be able to get another one. What reasonable precautions would the labourer have to take to meet the requirements of the clause? When the mother went upstairs to clean the bedroom the children would be left downstairs in the only room in which there was a fire. A child would begin to play with the fire, and it would get burned. That child was in a different position from the child of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman would have a nurse and an efficient fire-guard costing not a 1s. but £2 or £3. He maintained that this was class legislation, because it put an obligation on poor people which they were not able to carry out. Nobody deplored more than he or his right hon. friend did that children died under these circumstances. He could not believe that any Member of the House supposed that the passing of this clause would diminish the number of deaths from burning. What the clause would do would be to put on fathers and mothers who were already suffering grief and pain for the loss of a child the pain of being taken before the county bench and of having to pay out of their small earnings for not having taken proper charge of the child, besides being subjected to the odium of the charge.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said he was sorry to differ from the hon. Member for Berwickshire, who was deeply interested in these matters. In his defence of the clause the hon. Member went nearer than anyone else to show how totally illusory and unworkable it was. The clause consisted of two parts. The first part dealt with the fire-guard, and the second with "taking reasonable precautions." As it must be administered if it became law, any person having the care of a child would be required to have a fire-guard, and if he had a fire-guard of a certain cheapness and pattern, all would be well. Nobody would be expected to buy an expensive guard. Some enterprising firm would put a cheap fire-guard on the market, and a parent if he got such a fire-guard for 9d. or 1s. would not trouble himself further. In the second part of the clause, reference was made to "taking reasonable precautions" if there was no fire-guard. How could a parent take reasonable precautions against a child being burned? What kind of law was to be applied according to judicial precision? It might be pleaded that telling a child not to go near the fire was a reasonable precaution. They all agreed that the loss of a child by fire was a terrible thing, but he did not think it could be met by the clause as it stood. The Minister in charge of the Bill had said that there was nothing novel in the clause, and he cited certain curiosities of the law in regard to the difference between murder and manslaughter in cases arising from death by fire. The clause would introduce into every poor home a curiosity of the law far more extravagant than any now existing. The Minister in charge of the Bill also urged that the clause would be a most effective way of warning the careless of the terrible penalty which they would incur, not that provided for in the Bill, but in the remorse they would feel for the rest of their lives if a child died on account of their neglect. That was the most effective plea which the hon. Gentleman had put forward; but the parent might say that he never thought of that or what risk he was incurring in not having a fire-guard. Mothers were accused of being nervous and fidgety, but if they were as careless as was alleged by some, no child would survive beyond five years of age. The difficulties in the homes of the poor arose from the distraction caused by other duties than the constant care of the children by the mothers, the difficulties of the dinner having to be cooked, etc., and if any failed through negligence it might be because this clause added to the stock of distractions that they might be haled up before a Court of Justice and have a black mark put against their name of having been guilty of the manslaughter of their child. It might be possible that the amendment of the law of manslaughter would touch those who were callous custodians of their children, but 999 out of 1,000 parents were not callous, but simply distracted by the cares of home.

MR. BRAMSDON said he disliked very much repeating in one evening what had been said two hours before, but as he was the only coroner in the House at present—there were only two of them—who had had practical experience of this terrible question he might be allowed to say a few words in explanation of the reasons why he supported this clause, in the hope that he might throw a little light on the subject under discussion. He had held inquiries concerning hundreds of cases of the death of children by burning, and his heart had bled at seeing the horrible spectacles brought before him. His experience was similar to that of every coroner in the United Kingdom. The clause came before the House with the approval and sympathy of every coroner, and he ventured to say that if hon. Members could only come round with him a few times when engaged in his official duties they would support the clause. This was not a part of the Bill which affected the poorer classes only. He had held inquests on the children of well-to-do people, and that was an argument in some cases in favour of increasing the penalties rather than of making them less. There was a well-known case not very long ago in which the parents, having gone out, locking the door, the children were seen a little while after at the window burning, and the neighbours were unable to get up to the children, and nothing could be done to rescue them. The fact was that the parents were away gossiping, and had taken no particular care of the safety of their children. He remembered the Lord Advocate telling, during the Second Reading debate, of a somewhat similar instance having taken place in Edinburgh. Was nothing to be done to stop that sort of thing? Let them call it grandmotherly legislation, and talk of the cost of a fire-guard as a burden on the poor if they liked, but surely it was desirable to try to stop the sacrifice of child life, and the shilling fire-guard would do much in that direction. He was present when his hon. friend had produced a specimen fire-guard in Grand Committee. It was a very good guard, and in his opinion would be very effective.

He had never held an inquest cause of death of a child from where there had been a fire-guard house. If the presence of a fire-guard house would be the means of child life, ought they not as legislators do what they could to save the child? His hon. friend had objected to a number of cases of death of child by burning which had been quoted. He thought the House was aware that the clause under discussion formed the clause of the Bill which he had introduced last year. The figures were correct, and resulted from the inquiry made by the National Society for the Protection of Children. During the last year hundreds of resolutions were passed at meetings throughout England begging the Secretary to introduce this measure, and pass it into law; and he knew very well that there had never been any opportunity to it at any meeting where the subject had been properly explained. He thought that the magistrates were most to be trusted in the administration of the law, and they could be trusted to pay the attention to the circumstances of each case, the parents and the amount of care proved against them.

SIR SAMUEL SCOTT (Mary W.) said he did not intend to follow his hon. friend in his argument in favour of the clause. His reason for rising to ask a question of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill, as he thought the clause was somewhat vague. The hon. Member said—

“If any person over the age of sixteen who has the custody, charge or care of a child under the age of seven years,” &c.

The hon. Member was aware that in cases in the houses of the poor the children who had been all the day looking after the house and the children had been out to do some shopping, and the children were left in charge of a child when they came home from school—a child who might be only thirteen, or fourteen years of age. If a child under seven was left in the charge of a person under sixteen years of age, and anything happened to it, was the person liable to a fine of ten, twelve, or fourteen pounds? What was the meaning of the words “custody, charge or care”?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the words "custody, charge, or care" appeared in all the Cruelty to Children Acts, and were well understood. In such a case the parent would be liable.

MR. WALSH (Lancashire, Ince) said if there was any one clause in this Bill upon which any person could give a definite vote, it was this clause. A point had been raised that this was class legislation, but that did not seem to him to be of importance at all. The question was, was it legislation that was required, was it legislation that was wanted? He thought that it was. For a good deal more than a score of years the coroner for North-West Lancashire had urged upon Parliament the necessity for legislation, as there had been scores and scores of cases of children who had come to the most terrible deaths, viz., that caused by fire where it had not been properly safeguarded, and the little inflammable shirt had caught fire. It seemed to him that this clause would do good if it developed a higher sense of parental responsibility. He did not think it would lead a great deal to parents being summoned or brought before Courts, but the result would be that every parish council, every district council, and all the authorities of that kind would co-operate to bring to the notice of parents the new condition of things. Up to now there had been no authority on the part of anybody. Coroners had protested and cried aloud in vain, as they had no power to enforce anything, nor had any other person. If, however, some definite public authority could come to the assistance of parents and warn them to realise their responsibility, then he thought they would see, if not the end, a great decrease in this awful mortality. He had had some considerable difficulty in reconciling himself to several aspects of this Bill, but this was one to which he could not think that there would be any serious objection, because it had purely and simply for its object the saving of infant life. There was some attack to the effect that Labour Members were not there in large numbers to safeguard the interests of the working classes, but surely if there was one matter upon which the working classes were unanimous, it must be upon the necessity for such a measure as this. Upon the disputed medical point as to whether a very small drop of intoxicating liquor might or might not do a child harm, or whether juvenile smoking would cause national deterioration, there would be a good deal of room for difference of opinion, but on a clause like this he did not think any person who knew the conditions of life of our large and crowded centres of population, and who knew the fact that year after year hundreds, if not thousands, of children's lives were sacrificed, because of the difficulty under which the household was carried on—he did not think there could be any room for difference of opinion as to the necessity of a clause such as this, and he for one would have the heartiest possible pleasure in supporting it.

MR. THEODORE TAYLOR did not think he could allow this discussion to go by without saying one word about the flannelette question, which, as had been stated, was a very great cause of death to women and children. Flannelette was an article largely worn by all classes of the community, but particularly by the poor, and he was glad to find that the Under-Secretary had given some attention to the question in regard to it. He would, however, urge upon hon. Members that the question must be dealt with, because there were methods of making flannelette non-inflammable. He was not there to advocate any particular means, but there were methods known to science by which that very inflammable article of children's dress could be rendered innocuous in that respect. He thought the hon. Member was quite right in saying that it would be found to be the case that the major part of the 1,400 children's deaths was due to that material, and that if their clothes had been treated with one or other of those processes the accidents would not have happened. He knew what he was talking about and he thought the public authorities and Parliament should take note of the fact that there were now known to science methods of making cotton clothing absolutely non-inflammable. If some law could be passed by which no inflammable article of clothing of that kind should be allowed to be worn by children in particular without the necessary treatment it would be a very great boon to humanity. He believed in this Bill and in this clause, and if in addition to this measure some further provisions relating to the protection of children's clothing from taking fire were to be adopted by and by they would save a great many additional lives. As the hon. Member for St. Albans had said, these burnings did not all come from fires alone, they came from lamps, matches, and all kinds of things, but still this was a way of preventing part of this great loss. He was sure, however, they ought to go further.

*SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.) said that perhaps he might be allowed as a hospital surgeon who had seen a great many cases of burning of children, fatal and non-fatal, to add a few words. Even in the non-fatal cases there was nothing more painful to witness than the serious distress and disturbance caused by burning or scorching, but he wished to put in a word of warning in regard to this clause because he was not sure that there were not some hon. Members who assumed that the 1,400 cases of deaths of children from burns and scalds would be entirely obviated by it. On going round his wards that day he found two cases of burning or scalding of children, of which he inquired the cause. The first was a case in which the child had been left in a room alone with a box of matches, and using the matches had set fire to its clothing, and that would not be prevented by this clause. In another case the child took hold of a saucepan containing boiling fluid and upset it over itself. Therefore, hon. Members who assumed that these 1,400 cases of death could all be prevented by the clause were drawing somewhat upon their imaginations. He agreed that the clause might be a step in the right direction, but he thought that giving the opportunity to the working classes who had to be away during the day to put their children into creches where they could be managed and taken care of was the more correct mode of solving the problem.

*MR. REES said that this was obviously not class legislation because it applied equally to all, and it was equally obvious that it could affect only the poor. He denied that all the coroners were in favour of the Bill and quoted from a letter to The Times from the coroner of Surrey to the contrary effect. This was the third crime created that night, and he really thought it was worth while the Under-Secretary regarding figures to which he referred. On coroners, in an interesting examination of the statistics which had been published for 1904, and that was 1,122 for the whole of England and Wales, including adults, showed that these figures related only to the cases of scorching or burning to which they had been that night to refer. It was no more, superfluous to intervene, no purpose of supplying information, the purpose of asking for it from a quarter from which this very important proposal for good or ill was to proceed. What was a poor woman who had only one room and several children? While she was nursing a child and cooking the dinner, might fall into the fire. Was it for her to allow them to remain in that only room she had. [AN HON. MEMBER: She is there herself.] She was there herself, and was nursing one child and cooking the dinner. If one fire had been kindled against another, and it hit the kettle and overturned it, an unfortunate woman to be made a widow. Surely it was necessary to take account of the special circumstances of the people to whom legislation of this kind had particular, indeed exclusive application. After all was said and done, he himself did not believe that a fireproof screen that was anything more than a pretence could be bought for a poor person. But if it could, it was not fair to require it for poor people in this way. From what he had seen of the poor he thought the clause would hit them rather hard, and therefore hoped the Under-Secretary would be kind enough to enlighten them upon the figures which he had given, say if the coroner of Surrey, and the Duchy of Lancaster was his observations upon the statistics which had been read to the House.

MR. RAWLINSON admitted that this clause was a fair sample of the Bill. The speeches that had been made in favour of it were strong speeches, and the effect that the evil existed. The sympathies of the House had been excited by the pictures painted of the children who suffered from burning, but the figures given by the Under-Secretary were given in a very loose form.

the number of accidents from burning resulting from open fires was very much in doubt, and the figures put forward by the Government could not be supported. It was easy to draw a terrible picture of little children under seven years of age being burned, and nobody was more anxious than himself to prevent any injury to children by burning or otherwise. But the point he wished to make was that this clause would not remedy the evil, but on the contrary only work a great injustice on the real working people of the country. Some hon. Members seemed to think that the Bill made it an offence to leave a fire unguarded so that if the local authority knew of it they could come to the particular house and say "You have acted improperly, you must have your fire guarded by a guard, price 1s., on the recommendation of the Home Office." That was not the fact at all. There was no suggestion of that. It was not made an offence to leave a fire unguarded. What was done by this clause, the very worst form of legislation, was to say that if one had the misfortune to leave a fire unguarded, and one's child was severely injured, then the parent who had not the sense to prevent her child being burned in her absence, and who had already been sufficiently punished by the injury done to the child, was to be summoned and subjected to penalties. Legislation of that kind would not prevent children being burned, and when they were the parents were to be brought before the police court and sent to gaol. He ventured to submit that that kind of legislation was thoroughly bad, and that the House ought to oppose the section. Further than that he did not believe in the saving clause which said that if a fire was properly guarded there should be no offence. He believed fire-guards existed, but he did not believe any benefit could exist in the homes of the poor, either from the utility or the purpose of such fire-guards. He was no expert in fire-guards, but he knew something about children, and he knew that a 1s. fire-guard would not last very long in a house full of children. But apart even from all that, a fire-guard would not in his opinion prevent injury to children from burning. This, however, was not his real reason for objecting to this measure. His objection was that he did not believe the House would protect children from injury of this kind by making more criminals. One hon. Member had spoken from the point of view of the evil as seen by the coroners of the country. He himself spoke from the point of view of one who had seen the inefficacy of criminal law in the case of laws of this kind. He, therefore, asked the House to hesitate before they added another senseless crime to those with which the Courts had now to deal. He attached great importance to this as, in his opinion, this was an extremely dangerous clause.

TELLERS FOR THE
 Mr. Rawlinson
 Carlile.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out Subsection (2) of Clause 16. He had every sympathy with the first subsection of the clause, and had nothing to say against the penalty to be inflicted. He thought the second subsection, however, was unnecessary. It said that—or prostitution (as the case may be) if he has conduced thereto by knowing or believing the girl to consort with or to continue in the employment of any person or person of a notoriously immoral character. He objected to that subsection, because it was opposed to the principle of the English law that a person should be deemed to be innocent until proved to be guilty. There was who would not agree that the favouring of the seduction of a girl under sixteen was a very serious offence, but there was no reason why the law should be altered and a person charged with such an offence deemed to be guilty instead of having to be proved to be guilty. Secondly, he objected to the last five or six words of the subsection, viz.: "or person of a notoriously immoral character." What did they mean? If the father of a girl under sixteen allowed her to go into the service of a family, and one of the family happened to be a person of a notoriously immoral character, he would be deemed to be guilty, and would be liable to two years hard labour. The onus of proof was not put upon the prosecution. Who was to prove what the words "of a notoriously immoral character" meant? A number of people in the House held different views as to what was notoriously immoral. Some people had very strict views and others were a little lax; and to insert vague words of this character into a Bill and attach a penalty of two years hard labour seemed to him legislation which should not be allowed to pass. There was no definition of the words in the clause. He presumed the Under-Secretary did not know what they meant, and that it would be left to Judges to interpret them. Consequently they would have all sorts of interpretations. One Judge might hold a person who drank to be a notoriously immoral person and another Judge might take another view altogether. He hoped, if the hon. gentleman was unable to accept his Amendment, he would put in some Amendment of his own defining what he meant by "notoriously immoral." Personally, he thought it was almost impossible to define what was meant.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) seconded.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 10, line 24, to leave out sub-section 2. of Clause 16."—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. CHERRY said it appeared to him that the second subsection made the clause very much more definite. It really gave a definition which was very much needed of the word "favour." The first subsection ran—

"If any person having the custody, charge, or care of a girl under the age of sixteen years encourages or favours the seduction or prostitution of that girl, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and shall be liable to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two years."

Then the second subsection which the hon. Baronet moved to omit sought to define what "favouring" meant. It did so in language which was clear and distinct; and he could not see any ambiguity in it. It said—

"For the purpose of this section a person shall be deemed to have favoured the seduction or prostitution (as the case may be) of a girl if he has conduced thereto by knowingly allowing the girl to consort with or to enter or continue in the employment of any prostitute or person of a notoriously immoral character."

It would be necessary to prove that the child was not only allowed to go into the employment but also that the person in charge of her knew the character of the person into whose employment she had been allowed to go. That disposed of the first objection of the hon. Baronet that the subsection shifted the onus of proof. He could not see that it did so at all. On the contrary, it required very strict proof. The hon. Baronet also objected to the words "or person of a notoriously immoral character." He asked for a definition of them. They were almost identical with words in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, and during the twenty-three years that Act had been in force no question so far as he was aware had arisen as to their interpretation. Anyone understood them, and if they attempted any definition they would only involve themselves in very much more difficulty. Instead of the second subsection being in any way cumbersome, he thought it made the clause very much more definite.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not understand that his hon. friend desired so much to strike out the whole subsection as to draw the attention of the Government to the last five or six words of it. He could not quite agree that the second subsection made the first more definite. It was quite true it gave an instance of one particular kind of offence under the first subsection, but it did not put into clearer language the whole of what was contained in the previous subsection. On the contrary, the word "encourages" was left without any explanation whatever, and even the word "favours" was only defined to the extent that one particular instance of favouring was given in the second subsection. There was no complete definition. He could not therefore agree that the second made the first subsection more definite, but that was relatively a little point. He felt a little nervous himself about the concluding words "or person of a notoriously immoral character." They were alarmingly vague. If any old woman in the country sent her daughter up to London to go into service and in the place where she went there turned out to be a person of a notoriously immoral character, she would be liable under the subsection, although, living in the country, she knew nothing about it; all the word "knowingly" applied to was that of allowing the girl to consort, and "with a person of a notoriously immoral character" was the description of the person. Otherwise, there would not be any sense in putting in the word "notoriously." It would be enough to say "knowingly consort with a person of an immoral character." It did not make a person any more immoral because she was notoriously immoral, nor did it make her any more dangerous company for a young girl.

MR. H. J. TENNANT suggested that the word "knowingly" governed not only the "allowing of a girl to consort with," but also "of entering and continuing in the ment of a person of a no immoral character." He was whether the word "knowingly knowing that the character of th was immoral or knowing that was entering into the employm person of that character. Th was certainly one of a very character. There were two o to this kind of legislation. Th the chance that grave injustice committed by a person being by a tribunal as of a notoriously character who would not be so by the ordinary man in the There was much more serious the words were so vague that th authorities would not endeavour them in force, and they would re vague menace on the Statute Book by reason of its not being empl came more menacing to those to act under the statute. The A General for Ireland had qu Criminal Law Amendment Act and said that somewhat similar had not given rise to any c He had not made any study Criminal Law Amendment A his impression was that proceedings had been taken under words, and he suggested that th would be not less effective, but n dangerous if the last six words struck out. If there was a kind of person that the Governme had in their view against wh ought to be protected, let them s was in their mind. Of course, understood the danger of allowin persons of either sex to go i company of reputed thieves, but a different matter and was dealt other sections of the Bill. Wh had to guard against was consort prostitutes; the other words no definite meaning, and the Gov would be wise to agree to their c

MR. MACLEAN said with r the words "notoriously immoral, before him the section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, where they occurred. No difficulty whatever had arisen from the words "known immoral character." The words used in this clause were stronger. No cases had arisen, as far as his experience went, on the construction of these words, but he had known many cases under the section.

LORD R. CECIL: I think the hon. Member has great knowledge on this point. Will he allow me to ask him whether he knows of any case in which these words have been enforced for the purposes of the section?

MR. MACLEAN said he remembered a case of a girl or woman being of known immoral character so as to bring her within the section. It was disposed of without any difficulty at all. He did not say difficulty might not arise, but in those cases in which he had had experience no difficulty had arisen.

SIR F. BANBURY said he was not really enlightened by the explanation of the Attorney-General. The right hon. Gentleman said that subsection (2) was an interpretation of subsection (1.) He should say it was nothing of the sort. Subsection (1) was exceedingly clear and subsection (2) defined one word only. Under subsection (2) a person was deemed to be guilty until he was proved to be innocent, whereas in subsection (1) he was deemed to be innocent until he was proved guilty, which was the English law. The Attorney-General passed that by and did not reply to the point at all. What he really objected to were the vague words at the end of the section, "a person of a notoriously immoral character." The Attorney-General had not attempted to define the words, but had referred to an Act passed twenty-three years ago, and he could not say whether any case had arisen under the Act to show whether there had been any difficulty in determining what the words meant. Even the hon. Member for Bath could not say that any case had arisen. He should have to go to a division unless he got an explanation from the Government or a pledge that they would define the last six or seven words of the subsection.

TRADE RECORDS.

Departmental Committee on Trade Records.—Report of the Committee appointed by the Board of Trade to consider and report how far any change is desirable in the form in which the trade accounts of the United Kingdom are published as regards the countries from which imports are received and to which exports are sent.

Minutes of evidence taken before the Departmental Committee on Trade Records, with appendices and index.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

Summary of accidents and casualties reported to the Board of Trade by the several railway companies in the United Kingdom during the three months ended 30th June, 1908, in pursuance of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1871, with reports to the Board of Trade by the inspecting officers, assistant inspecting officers, and sub-inspecting officers of the railway department upon certain accidents which were inquired into.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

Thirty-seventh Annual Report for 1907-1908.

Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

INDIA.

Civil Service.—Examinations for admission to the Civil Service of India. Alterations in Regulations IV., V., VI. and VIII.

VOL CXCIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Loans raised in England.—Return of all loans raised in England under the provisions of any Acts of Parliament, chargeable on the revenues of India, outstanding at the commencement of the half-year ended 30th September, 1908, with the rates of interest and total amount payable thereon, and the date of the termination of each loan, the debt incurred during the half-year, the moneys raised thereby during the half-year, the loans paid off or discharged during the half-year, and the loans outstanding at the close of the half-year; stating, so far as the public convenience will allow, the purpose or service for which moneys have been raised during the half-year.

SHOP HOURS ACT, 1904.

Closing Order made by the Urban District Council of Enniskillen.

Laid before the House (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the Table.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I should like to ask the noble Earl who leads the House whether he is in a position to tell us anything as to the arrangements for the conduct of business during the next few days.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): My Lords, we were in hopes that the Children Bill would have passed through its last stage in another place to-day. I understand there is still some hope that that may be the case. The debate seems to have been rather longer than was originally expected, and it is not quite certain whether the Bill will be able to pass its final stage in the other House to-day. If it should come up I would suggest that there should be a formal sitting of the House to-morrow, in order that it might be read a first time and be printed and distributed to your Lordships. In that case we could hope to take the Second Reading on Monday; but, if not, there appears to be no business that could be conveniently taken before next Tuesday, and in the event of the Children Bill not coming up I would suggest that we should not sit again for business until Tuesday, the 20th inst., on which day the Nurses Registration Bill would be taken. I understand that there will be Motions or Bills upon the Paper for every day next week, and there are certain Bills in the hands of private Members which I would venture to suggest those in charge of them might be willing to put down for an early date. Those Bills are the Movable Dwellings Bill, the Local Authorities (Admission of the Press) Bill, and the Thrift and Credit Banks Bill, which, I understand, is waiting until certain negotiations have taken place between interested parties. That Bill, your Lordships will remember, was one which was brought forward by Lord Wenlock in the Summer Session, and upon which a considerable amount of discussion followed. There is also the Law of Distress (Amendment) Bill, which Lord Courtney has been asked to put down for an early day. I would venture also to suggest that noble Lords who desire to raise questions likely to lead to at all prolonged debate on any matters of public interest should, if they think fit to do so, put them down for an early date, because we had some experience in the summer of questions being raised and leading to very interesting discussions at a time when there was a considerable pressure of public business. So far as regards the Government's Bills, I hope that the Education (Scotland) Bill will reach us not later than the second week in November, and it is understood that the Licensing Bill will arrive here in the course of the week after that. I think that is as much information as I am in a position to give your Lordships at this moment.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I do not think the noble Earl mentioned one Bill in which I know some Members of the House take great interest—the Bill for the Housing of the Working-classes in Ireland.

THE EARL OF CREWE: I am obliged to the noble Marquess for reminding me. It is proposed that the Committee Stage of that Bill should be taken on Thursday of next week.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, 13th October, 1907

The House met at a quarter of Three of the Clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

The British South Africa Company.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether His Majesty's Government are about to assist the British South Africa Company either in meeting the interest on the railway debentures or otherwise in the development of Rhodesia.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) No.

Milk Supply.

SIR FRANCIS CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has now completed the consultations with the Board of Agriculture as to dealing with tuberculous cows, and is now in a position either to bring in the Milk Bill at an early date or to take prompt and effective administrative action to secure greater purity in the supply of milk to the Metropolis and the great centres of population.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The matter is receiving attention, but I am not at present in a position to take action of the kind referred to in the Question.

Tuberculosis in Cattle—Report of Commission.

SIR FRANCIS CHANNING: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Report of the Tuberculosis Commission will be immediately issued; and, if not, whether, having regard to the constant demands of local authorities for further powers to deal with this disease, whether as affecting the public health or cattle, and to the questions constantly raised by agriculturists, butchers, and others as to the losses caused by the persistence of this disease, he will press the Commission to report promptly and undertake to deal with the whole question of the extirpation of this scourge by national and adequate machinery at the earliest moment.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have made inquiry and am informed that no definite date can be fixed for the issue of the final Report of the Royal Commission, but I understand that they are now preparing another interim Report, dealing with the infectivity of milk from tuberculous cows, which will probably be presented next month. I will bring under the notice of the Commission the desire expressed in the latter part of the Question with regard to their Report.

Regulation of Motor Traffic in the Metropolis.

SIR FRANCIS CHANNING: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the increase of fatal and other serious street accidents, due to motor traffic, in the last two or three years, and having regard to the fact that, except in the parks, the excessive speed of motor vehicles, especially in crowded thoroughfares, has become a public danger, he will, either by new or more stringent regulations or by a special order to the police, take steps to obtain throughout the Metropolis some uniform restriction of speed and the more effective enforcement of the law.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)
The police are instructed to enforce the law as effectively as their powers permit. I have no authority to bring about by regulation or order any "uniform restriction of speed"; that, I must repeat, can be done only by the Local Government Board acting on the application of the local authorities under Section 9 of the Motor Car Act.

Duty on Toy Playing Cards.

MR. W. PEARCE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been given to the use of toy cards for money stakes; and if their exemption from duty can be discontinued.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)
My attention has been called to this matter, and I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject.

Closing of a Portion of the Regent's Park.

SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether a portion of the Regent's Park, between the grounds of St. Katherine's

Lodge and the shrubbery lying east of the fountain in the Brook to which the public formerly has been railed off; and, if so, purpose it is intended to put this portion of the park.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.)
A portion of the park was closed some time ago in order to restore the grass which had got into a bad condition. I am considering whether it may with advantage be re-opened next spring.

Date of Completion of Queen Victoria Memorial.

SIR W. J. COLLINS: To ask the First Commissioner of Works now give a date by which the statue to Her late Majesty Queen Victoria in St. James's Park will be completed.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.)
I am unable to fix a definite date, as much depends upon the progress of the work which may be made within three to four months.

OLD-AGE PENSION REGULATIONS.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I wish to draw your attention, Mr. Secretary, to what I believe to be a breach of the privileges of this House concerning the Board of Inland Revenue. The House will remember that under the Old Age Pensions Act it was provided that in estimating the income of a claimant for a pension, the value of any advantage accruing to him from any property enjoyed by him was not to be taken into account. The Treasury authorised the issue of regulations for the administration of the Act. Those regulations may be laid before the House later, and I do not know whether they will be. I am referring to a copy of the instructions which have been issued to the Board of Inland Revenue officers. These instructions were published in the Daily Telegraph in September. When, however, I asked for a copy of them, I was informed that they were secret instructions. The object of the instructions is to instruct the officers that, in estimating the income of a claimant, they are to take in the value of free board and lodging, but not the value of furniture and personal effects, unless it exceeds £30, and they are always to deduct £30 from the value of the furniture. There is nothing in the Act or in the regulations issued by the Treasury authorising that deduction, and the effect of the deduction will be in many cases to put the claimant into a higher category for claiming pension than he would otherwise be. In other words, the effect of the instructions is to impose a charge on the taxpayer, and I submit that that is a breach of the privilege of the House. The House refused to allow the House of Lords to amend the Bill in any respect, but the Board of Inland Revenue is here claiming to do what we did not allow the House of Lords to do. I can quite see that it would be extremely inconvenient if every breach of an Act of Parliament were treated by the House as a breach of privilege; but I venture to submit that this is an abnormal case. It is abnormal in the first instance because there is no possible means by which the Courts of law can be invoked to correct it. The Act itself provides that there shall be no appeal to any Court of law, and therefore there is no means of putting the law in force. The only other possibility is the intervention of the Comptroller and Auditor-General, but that can only take place after two years, and it would be practically impossible for him to ascertain what persons have had their furniture incorrectly valued, and it would also be impossible to recover the amount. Therefore I submit that in this particular case there is no other means of dealing with the matter except to treat it as a breach of privilege of the House of Commons. I submit it is a breach of privilege, because this body is not merely committing an accidental breach of the law, but is claiming what is equivalent to a concurrent legislative power with this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was kind enough to inform me beforehand of his intention to raise this question, and I have used the interval to endeavour to inform myself as to whether any precedent existed of a case similar to that which is now brought before the attention of the House; but I have searched in vain among the precedents of breaches of privilege for anything at all in the nature of the one the hon. Member now claims to be a breach of privilege. If, as the hon. Member says, a Department of the State has violated an Act of Parliament, the proper course is to indict the Minister here for the action of his Department. That would seem to be the natural and normal course. The hon. Member says that the Courts of law are not open to him. I do not know how that may be. I would not like to give an opinion on that; but it is quite clear that it would be extremely undesirable to extend our view of a breach of privilege, as it would be extended if we were to treat as a matter of privilege every occasion on which we think that a Minister of the Crown is not carrying out an Act of Parliament in a way which appears to the House to be the proper way. Either the Courts of law are open or they are not. If they are not open there is the ordinary way of calling to account a Minister of the Crown, and I think I must leave the hon. Member to take what course he can in that respect.

MR. HAROLD COX asked whether he would be in order in moving the adjournment of the House that night on the ground that this was a definite matter of urgent public importance. That it was of public importance was obvious, and, with regard to urgency, this was a continuing breach of the law, going on day by day, and should be stopped at once.

*MR. SPEAKER: This seems to be a matter of ordinary daily administration. The Inland Revenue Department, along with the Local Government Board, is called upon to administer this Act. I do not think it would be possible to move the adjournment of the House on a matter of that sort, otherwise, whenever a matter of so-called maladministration or improper administration was pointed out or conceived to exist, the adjournment of the House could be moved. I think the hon. Member should be left to use such means as are at his disposal to bring the matter before the House.

MR. HAROLD COX: May I point out that it is not a question of administration; it is a question of giving instructions which are obviously at variance with the text of the Act of Parliament.

*MR. SPEAKER: Whether they are at variance or not with the Act of Parliament is a point which I cannot decide. The hon. Member thinks they are, probably the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes a different view.

THE WOMAN SUFFRAGISTS.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) said he had intended to ask the Prime Minister whether he had been asked to receive a deputation from the Women's Social and Political Union with regard to woman suffrage, and whether with a view to allaying the excitement which existed and which was leading to the women being again sent to prison, and to possible disturbances in the streets, he had any further statement to make on the subject of the enfranchisement of women. He had received from the Prime Minister notice that he was unable to be present to-day. He would accordingly ask the Home Secretary whether the Government were prepared to make any definite statement concerning the enfranchisement of women.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): This is the first notice I have received. Obviously I cannot make any statement in reply to the hon. Member. I must refer him to the utterances of the Prime Minister and to the right hon. Gentleman's answers to Questions in this House.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: May I ask the Home Secretary whether, as the prosecutions have now been entered upon as Government prosecutions, he will treat women who may be found guilty as political offenders, and see that they obtain the privileges of first-class misdemeanants usually accorded to prisoners of that class?

MR. GLADSTONE: The measures which have been taken are obviously police measures in the interests of law and order. If and when any persons are convicted as the result of any proceedings which may be taken, it will be open to the hon. Member to put any Question he likes to me on the subject. But I cannot answer a hypothetical Question.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Have the prosecutions which are taking place been instigated by the Government, reported in this morning's Press?

MR. GLADSTONE: They have been instigated by the Government, Government will certainly supply the police in taking any necessary measures for the preservation of order.

Amendments agreed to

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) moved the omission of Clause 39. (Penalty on selling tobacco to children and young persons.) He wished in the first instance to say that in his opinion cigarette smoking, and indeed any kind of smoking, by young children was extremely injurious. But that was not his reason for moving the omission of the clause. He did that because he thought that this continual interference on the part of the State in the home life of the young was wrong, and was likely to lead to more mischief than the particular evil in question would bring about. Smoking, he thought, was injurious to everyone, of whatever age. His right hon. friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham asked him if he smoked. No, he did not. That was to say, he smoked two cigarettes after dinner. He did not think that could be called smoking. If they were going to legislate against smoking, they should legislate against his right hon. friend as much as against a child fourteen years of age. One knew from personal experience of many cases in which men had lost their nerves through excessive smoking—through smoking not merely cigarettes, but long black cigars which were extremely injurious to health. The House would be taking an extremely strong step if it passed this clause. Liberals as well as Conservatives had been brought up with the idea that there was a responsibility upon the parent to rear the child in the way it should go. It had always been held that the State should not interfere in matters of domestic life and domestic economy. Yet they were going by this clause to say that the father or mother was not a fit person to have charge of a child and to prevent smoking; they were going to regulate the affairs of private life not by example or precept, but by the policeman. He remembered as a boy remarking around the great number of notices beginning "Il est défendu," and being told by his father that freedom from these prohibitions was the great advantage enjoyed by an Englishman. As a young man he was proud of being an Englishman, because in England unless one stole, or murdered, or broke other of the Ten Commandments he was free to do as he liked. But now all was altered. We were apparently bent on copying the bad ways of the foreigner, and regulating people's existence by the will of a majority of the House of Commons, backed up by the inspector and the policeman. That was clearly a step in a retrograde direction. He had often been accused of being a reactionary, but he did not want to follow the example of other countries in this respect. He preferred to maintain the example of the England of his boyhood—an example which had made England what it is. He wanted to maintain the spirit of self-reliance and self-help. One result of this legislation would be that smoking among the young would be increased. He did not smoke now, but when he was a schoolboy at Winchester he did. Why? Because he knew that if he was found out he would be flogged, and therefore it was the correct thing to smoke. That was the experience not of Winchester only, but of every public school in England. It might have had a deleterious effect—it certainly had on him personally—but still it was supposed to be the correct thing to smoke. In the same way a small boy walking through St. James' Park would smoke a cigarette out of mere bravado, knowing that if he was caught by a park ranger he would be apprehended. He would think it a manly thing to do. Parliament had already gone far to relieve the parent of his responsibility. They had relieved him of the burden of education, and now he believed they were going to relieve him of the duty of feeding his children. What was the use of having a parent at all? Why not take the child at eight months of age and put him into a State home, there to be brought up on the most approved principles? Overeating was just as injurious as occasional excess in smoking. But whereas when a child began to smoke he was generally very ill—at least, that was his own experience—he could do a great deal of overeating without Nature stepping in. He had no doubt that quite as much injury was done to adults as well as young children by overeating and intemperance as by smoking. There were other good sound arguments against this clause. He believed it would be practically unworkable, and would place the honest shopkeeper who desired to obey the law in a very difficult position. How was the unfortunate tobacconist to know when a boy was "apparently under sixteen years of age"? When he was at school some boys at sixteen had moustachios, while others looked only eleven or twelve. The conscientious shopkeeper would be hit, but the man who did not care 2d. about the law would do a great trade, and in all probability would not be found out. This was really class legislation. It would not affect the rich man. If a poor man, having got home tired, wanted a penny packet of tobacco, he could not send his son under sixteen to get it, but his right hon. friend the Member for Bordesley could send out his servant to buy a cigar—a long black one—which would do his right hon. friend a great deal of harm. He appealed to the Labour Members to support him in this matter. He would not be surprised if the majority of them smoked before they were sixteen, and he did not know a healthier or better developed body of men. If they smoked before they were sixteen, why should it hurt their sons? He really believed this was a foolish measure which would do no good and might do harm.

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) seconded the Amendment. He said this was one of the most extraordinary clauses ever presented to the House. The question was not whether the boy was sixteen, but whether he was apparently under sixteen. It did not matter what his actual age was. These Bills seemed to be knocked together in a haphazard way by some benevolent gentleman who wished to do all the good he could; everybody brought him a fresh clause, and the more the merrier, and he stuck them all in. He had the utmost respect for the intentions of the Minister in charge of the Bill; his only complaint against him was that he did not worship at the right shrine. If hon. Gentlemen really worshipped at the shrine of the Goddess of Liberty, they would know how to deal with such proposals. Who was there in the House who worshipped at the shrine? The hon. Baronet the Member for the City—yes; but when it came to the important question of compulsorily poisoning the blood of the nation, he was all for compulsion. What was the chief cause of physical deterioration amongst poor people? It was the want of food when they were young. This Government which did not worship at the shrine of the Goddess of Liberty, instead of giving the children food, preferred to send the children to school without breakfast, dinner, or tea. If they would only let the parents alone, the children would grow up strong men and women. He did not say that there was any general deterioration; he did not think there was, but there were great numbers of the population who had much deteriorated, and one could not go into a police Court without seeing what a miserable lot some of those people were. Their deterioration was brought about by interference with human liberty, which would bring about a great deal more harm than it could possibly do good, because it was interfering with the authority of the parents, and with a boy's judgment as to what was just. Boys, like most people whose reasoning faculties were not fully developed, had a very strong feeling in favour of justice; nothing irritated a boy so much as not to be treated fairly. He would think it very unfair; he would say: "The governor smokes, and the masters smoke, and the sixth form smoke, and I don't smoke," and it would affect his ideas of reverence and duty. Perhaps it was better for them to laugh than to cry, but he was almost inclined to cry when he thought of the great harm that was going to be done by this extraordinary legislation. Part III. of the Bill was in watertight compartments, and these penal clauses stood by themselves. As the result of not paying a fine, there was the alternative of going to prison. All the official classes liked that; it meant more work for gaolers, warders, and police, but he did not like it, and, therefore, he objected to the penal clauses for the sake of doing what some people thought was good. They should go about it in the right way, by trying to educate the people as to the effects of nicotine upon their system; but a little child heard praises of smoke, he saw his father smoking cigars, his neighbours burnishing up their meerschaum pipes, and shops filled with cigarettes, and he heard very few warning voices. The good men in that House thought the short way to make the world right was to pass a law: but that was a long way round. They should rely more on giving enlightenment to the people. Dr. Johnson said—he did not agree with Dr. Johnson—that they were always right in thrashing a school boy, because he was either going to or coming from mischief. He would go to other mischief, which might be worse still, and he objected to driving things in. Let them do their smoking in public. He remembered a young relation of his who did not distinguish himself in mathematics, but who distinguished himself when he saw him one day by smoking a big cigar. He advanced to him, took the cigar, and threw it away. He was not a policeman, or a magistrate, but a relative, in loco parentis. That youth was a stronger man than he was, and a better football player, and altogether a much superior person, notwithstanding that he had learned to smoke before he was sixteen. Hon. Members should pause before they rushed into this arena. Smoking was one of the most popular things that was done to-day, and this, he thought, was the most drastic attempt at interfering with popular habits that had ever been proposed in any legislature under the sun. A relative of his in the States said they had all these laws, but they laughed at them. The idea that people ought to obey and respect the law was rapidly passing away, but he wanted to retain that idea, and he thought that before they attacked a habit that had not yet been much lectured or preached against, they should try the milder method of lecturing and teaching. If all those people who wanted to put an end to the smoking of boys would give up smoking themselves they would do well. Would they sooner have the policeman and the fine in Court, with the pot in the background, than give up smoking themselves? If so, he was not going to help them; but if they were really against smoking they would give it up, and that would be quite sufficient to stop boys from smoking.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 14, to leave out Clause 2."—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'if any person' stand part of the Question."

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) said that this part of the Bill, although small in proportion to the whole measure, had attracted much public attention, because it was novel in character and because it touched habits that were widespread, but although it was a subordinate part of the Bill, he thought it was an important part. It touched very closely the general question of national physique, which had attracted in recent years so very much attention. The nation was more and more becoming concerned for the physical condition of large masses of its population. He did not pretend for a moment that juvenile smoking was a main cause of physical deficiency—he would not use the word deterioration, for deterioration had not been proved. The conversion of our people mainly into a nation of town dwellers instead of a nation of country dwellers, the over-crowding of our cities, alcoholism, above all under-feeding—these no doubt were the main causes of the low standard of physique which was widely prevalent amongst a large section of our population; but unquestionably the evil of juvenile smoking did contribute to that end, and any measures that could be effectively designed to prevent it would undoubtedly contribute to remedy the evil from which the nation was suffering. As he said yesterday, the subject had been authoritatively inquired into again and again. There was a Royal Commission on Physical Training in Scotland in 1903, and that Commission in their Report said that—

"Tobacco smoking before maturity is reached had a most prejudicial effect on physical development, and this evil and increasing practice cannot be too strongly denounced."

The next inquiry into the subject was that made by the Inter-Departmental Committee on Physical Deterioration, and in their Report they said—

"The question of juvenile smoking at the period of life dealt with in this and the preceding subsection has been given some prominence in evidence, and the Committee have received communications on the subject from the late London School Boards and one or two anti-smoking leagues. The evidence submitted on the point represents a practically unanimous opinion that the habit of cigarette-smoking amongst boys is a growing one, and that its consequences are extremely deleterious."

They quoted a great deal of medical and other evidence, including the evidence of Colonel Leetham, the late Chief Inspector of Recruiting, in Manchester, who said that—

“Perhaps a third of the rejects from the Army in Lancashire might be attributed to smokers’ heart. This is no doubt an excessive estimate, but it shows one bad consequence of early smoking, and it is common knowledge that smoking affects the wind and general physical capacity.”

The Committee recommended that Parliament should prohibit the sale of tobacco and cigarettes to children below a certain age. Two years later there followed the Committee of the House of Lords which was appointed to inquire into the question of juvenile smoking alone, and he must trouble the House with an extract from their Report. They said—

“The Committee were much impressed by the unanimous opinion of all the witnesses, including the representatives of the tobacco trade, that the habit of tobacco smoking produces indirectly a number of ills, facilitates the work of disease, and leads to habits of drink. They were especially impressed by the evidence to the effect that there are no signs of physical deterioration amongst girls. The witnesses all said that the reason for this was that girls are, generally speaking, entirely free from this habit. It has been proved conclusively to the Committee that juvenile smoking has increased rapidly during the last few years, and that it has had a bad effect upon the general health and physique of the present generation, whilst it must have even a worse effect upon the future generations”; and they concluded with an emphatic and unanimous recommendation of legislation in the next session of Parliament—one was accustomed to that phrase—on lines which had been closely followed in the drafting of this Bill. They continually heard the complaint that again and again Committees and Commissions were appointed, which took much evidence and entered conscientiously into the subjects submitted to them; they heard many witnesses of authority and came to unanimous conclusions, but their weighty Blue-books were placed on upper shelves, and no one ever took any further notice of them. Here they had a case in point, and no stronger case could be made out, of three separate authoritative bodies all unanimously of opinion that here was not merely some trifling sentimental grievance, but a really great evil closely touching the physique of a very large class of the population.

In the Royal Navy the King’s Regulations forbade smoking under the age of eighteen, whether ashore or afloat. Why that interference with liberty? In the Army regimental regulations were designed to suppress smoking. The local education authorities in many parts of the country had issued warnings to parents against it, and were in some cases educating as to the evils of the habit. There was legislation on this subject in almost every Anglo-Saxon country in the world—in almost all the self-governing Colonies, in a large number of the States of the American Union—as well as some other countries such as Japan. He quoted the experience of other countries not as an argument that this Parliament should legislate merely because others had done so, but in order to show that this was no mere fad or vagary on the part of the present Administration, but that it had been found necessary over a large part of the globe to take measures in recent years against this new and growing vice.

MR. LUPTON asked for a summary of the results in those countries.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he believed that where the laws had not been spoiled by the timid legislators who thought they were going too far they had been exceedingly useful, and the experience of the Colonies was that there was no desire whatever to repeal those laws. As a matter of fact, in Canada since this Bill was introduced legislation had been passed through the Canadian Parliament following almost word for word the clauses of this Bill. Public opinion in this country, so far as one could judge, by a great majority, supported this legislation in principle. He had received great numbers of letters and resolutions relating to the Bill, and there was no part of it which commanded a more widespread approval amongst the general body of the nation than that portion of the Bill—he was not speaking of the details, but of the principle—which dealt with juvenile smoking, and even the tobacco trade had made no representations at all against the principle of those clauses. One association had indeed proposed some amendments in detail. He had watched the movement in that trade closely, and he believed that as a whole the tobacco trade approved this portion of the Bill—out of sheer good citizenship. They knew they would lose some profit by it, but they wished their trade to be free from the stigma of contributing to the physical deterioration of the nation. The hon. Baronet who moved the rejection of the clause in a speech which was more humorous than weighty, if he might say so, asked why they did not apply legislation like this to older people; but that was a futile suggestion. The whole of this Bill was for the protection of children and child life, and contained numerous proposals absolutely inapplicable to older people. Throughout all its history Parliament had drawn a distinction between legislation for the young and that suited for older people. The hon. Baronet said that parental discipline was better than the discipline of the State. No doubt it was, he quite agreed, but if parental discipline was absent, were they to do nothing? Were they to watch this evil grow? While hon. Members gave vent to copy-book headings, the evil progressed. There was a rapidly increasing sale of these noxious cigarettes at five a penny, and the time had undoubtedly come when that sale should be stopped. They must adhere to that clause which prohibited the sale of cigarettes to children. It was no novel principle, it was no new interference with liberty. Spirits must not be sold to children under sixteen under legislation of long standing. Beer or any other form of alcoholic liquor must not be sold for their own consumption to children under fourteen. Was that a wrong interference with liberty? Was that open to objection? Did that prevent the national greatness of England being maintained?

SIR F. BANBURY said he always opposed the Children Bill.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the other example was far older than that. As long ago as 1872 the prohibition of the sale of spirits to children was enacted. Then again explosives might not be sold to children; that was not quite analogous, but the analogy of liquor and cigarettes was a close one. The hon. Baronet said the clause was unjust because it contained the word "apparently." How could a tobacconist be expected to know whether a person was under the age of sixteen or not? This was no new principle. The word occurred again and again in Acts of Parliament in similar circumstances, and it was the only way in which they could effectively draw a clause like that. If they were to leave out the word, there would indeed be a great hardship on the tobacconist. If they were to say to him "You cannot sell to a child under sixteen," it would be very hard on him to have no protection; but so long as they used the word "apparently" they had a good defence for the tobacconist. In the first place, he could say a boy looked older than sixteen and therefore he was legally entitled to sell to him, while if a small boy who looked under sixteen was in fact over sixteen, and if it was proved that in fact he was over sixteen, no offence had been committed. The Pawnbrokers' Act of 1872 made it an offence to take any article in pawn from any person apparently under twelve years of age. In London and Liverpool the age was sixteen years. The Licensing Act of 1872 made it an offence for the holder of a licence to sell spirits to any person apparently under the age of sixteen. The Metal Dealers' Act made it an offence for a dealer to sell to or purchase from any person apparently under the age of fourteen. The Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act said the age of a child was to be gauged by appearance unless the contrary was proved. This clause had not been hastily drawn without consideration; it had been very carefully considered. There was one modification in the clause which perhaps might be made with advantage. There was an Amendment down to omit lines 16 to 19, which dealt with the case of a person who gave a cigarette or cigarette papers to a person for his own use, which he had purchased or otherwise obtained on behalf of, or for the purpose of giving them to such a person. Those words bore on their face the stamp of compromise in Committee. He did not think they were satisfactory words. He did not think so at the time in Committee. They were inserted in order, on the one hand, not to make it an offence merely to give a cigarette to a boy, on the other hand to retain some power of dealing with those cases in which an older boy went into a shop as the agent of a younger boy, and came out, having bought the cigarettes, and gave them to him. He was sorry to give up those words, but he could foresee that they would give rise to prolonged discussion; they were not satisfactory as they stood, and he should not resist the Amendment to omit them. But the clause as a whole was discussed for a day and a half in Committee, and at the end was carried by a majority of two to one. He had little doubt the House would confirm the action of the Committee in that respect. It might be convenient if he said that their minds were not at all closed to modifications in the later clauses. He had recognised from the beginning that the fortunes of the Bill must depend to a very large degree on the goodwill of the Opposition. A measure of that kind, which contained 135 clauses, nearly forty of them entirely new matter, almost all the rest of them containing Amendments of greater or smaller importance, in a crowded session like that, could not find its way to the Statute-book unless it had the support and approval of the House as a whole, and he would like to take that opportunity of expressing on his own behalf, and on behalf of the Government, their obligations to the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite for the assistance which they had given in the main to the progress of the Bill. There was one clause in that part of the Bill which he believed was particularly distasteful to them, and also to some hon. Members on his side of the House; he meant the clause which imposed a penalty on the child himself, Clause 41, which they thought was open to grave objection. That clause did not propose to bring a child before a Police Court, but in the last resort only before a juvenile Court. In the second place the child would never be committed to prison, because in ordinary cases that was abolished by this Bill. The clause, however, was subject to a great deal of discussion in Committee, and he gave a pledge in Committee in order to assist its passage that it should be amended to the effect that on the occasion of a first offence on the part of a child no step should be taken except that notice should be sent to the parent of the child; on the second occasion the child might be brought before a juvenile Court, when he would be liable to no more severe penalty than a reprimand; and on the third occasion only was a fine of not more than 5s. to be allowed. That clause, he thought, would be of some use, but complicated as it would be, and cumbrous in its application, he did not think it was of the very importance, and indeed, in Committee he said again and again that he regarded Clause 41 as by any means the most important. He attached more importance to the prohibition of sale, and also to the provision in the next clause, that where a child was smoking in a public place a parent should have the right of making up the materials which he was using. He thought that was a comparatively easy way of dealing with what was not a very grave offence. It was to suppress it, but there was undoubtedly in the minds of many persons a disinclination to suppressing it by bringing in the machinery of the penal law. He had desired to retain Clause 41, but he thought it would deal with a boy who was defiant, and it would leave the powers in the hands of the police so limited as they would not be wise to use, but he admitted that the clause was whittled down as it would be by Amendments he had undertaken to insert, would not be of very great value. Even with those Amendments it passed the Committee by a bare majority of two votes. He must realise that and he was sure the House realised that in any legislation of this character in this country was novel so far as it dealt with juvenile smoking, it was in the first instance to proceed slowly, not to go the whole length of what might be essential, further, that in legislation of this kind public opinion should be carried with them all, and that the Bill should represent a general consensus of opinion, as it was in that House. One or two other Amendments might perhaps be suggested, and he trusted that if this part of the Bill was approached by the Government with that conciliatory spirit the discussion of the Bill would be facilitated, and the hon. Members opposite would realise that that part of the Bill, having been modified to meet their views, would be free from many of the objections which they had urged.

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.I.) said he would say a few words in reference to his speech to which they had just listened. He thought many of his hon. friends would agree with the hon. Gentleman in admitting the gravity of the

which the Bill was designed to cope. While he and his hon. friends admitted the importance of the matter, they maintained that very inadequate machinery had been provided by the draftsman of the Bill. His hon. friend the Member for the City of London was absolutely right in describing this as class legislation. Objection had been taken to this clause on the ground that it was an interference with the right of the poorer families who could not keep servants. In connection with the sale of drink to children, they arrived at a sensible compromise which allowed a boy or girl to be sent for the deleterious article provided that it was supplied in a sealed bottle. The difficulty in regard to the sale of liquor was got over in that way, but the Government had not adopted that method here. There was an absolute prohibition of a young member of a family being sent as a messenger to a tobacconist to purchase a packet of cigarettes, or cigarette papers. He suggested that a reasonable way of meeting this difficulty would be to adopt the course which was taken in the case of liquors. Let the packet be sealed. The proposal in the Bill would then be no longer open to the charge that it was class legislation, and the result would be that a senior member of a family would be able to send one of the younger members to a tobacconist for cigarettes. He thought importance would be attached to the word "apparently." There was no use in the hon. Gentleman getting up and saying that the word occurred in other Acts of Parliament. Its use in this case would lead to a serious defect in the Bill. The word must mean apparently to the vendor. The vendor must have an opportunity of judging whether the child was apparently under or over sixteen years of age. What was going to happen in cases where cigarettes were purchased by post? There were advertisements in newspapers announcing that on receipt of so many stamps the advertisers would send so many packets of cigarettes. How could the vendor judge of the age of the purchaser in such cases? Was it intended that the word "sell" should apply to retail by post? The word "apparently" would send the Under-Secretary into a great anomaly, and a better term would be "good reason to believe." There was nothing easier than to send a packet of cigarettes by post, and a new trade might spring up of that kind. As the clause stood, it made it an offence for a tobacco merchant to sell cigarettes to a young person whether for that person's own use or the use of somebody else. That was proposed on the basis that smoking by young persons was a great national evil. He would point out, however, that the clause did not prohibit the giving of tobacco to young persons, the only prohibition was that such persons should not smoke in a public place. He could only assume that the clause was the drafting of timid legislators who were afraid to go so far as to make it a penalty to give cigarettes to young persons.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.) remarked that the Under-Secretary had said that the clause had occupied a day and a half in Committee. That showed that it was a very important one, and he did not know that it was adequately discussed in the time given to it. The question seemed very complicated at the present moment, and he could not see why the Government had confined themselves to cigarettes and cigarette papers. There were other modes of smoking equally deleterious. A cigarette was defined as a small cigar or tobacco rolled up in paper. Apparently, boys might smoke any cigar except a small one. The whole matter was very complicated. He wished to support the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London in his Motion to omit the clause, and he did so on the grounds brought forward by the hon. Member for Sleaford. The Government were beginning at the wrong end in inflicting penalties upon children. The Under-Secretary had said that the national physique was suffering through cigarette smoking, and told the House that the nation was more and more considering the question and that public opinion supported the Bill. If that were so, he asserted that the clause proposed legislation on the wrong lines. If the general body of the nation were in favour of the Bill and opposed to smoking by children it was the business of the parents of the children to see that they did not smoke. He objected to a clause of that sort being applied to the children themselves, for they could not know what the 135 clauses in the eighty-two pages of the Bill contained. It was the duty of Parliament to put the penalties upon the parents and not evils. He did not often find himself in agreement with some of his hon. friends on pure political matters, but he was heartily in agreement with them when they regretted that the liberty of the country was being more and more encroached upon. With regard to hon. Members below the gangway who were supposed to represent the Democratic Party, there was not a proposal for the curtailment of individual liberty but received their earnest support. That was democracy, not according to the old definition of the term. It was tyranny, and nothing else. It was true Socialism that the individual and the influence of the individual was to be destroyed, and the State and the regulations made by the State were to follow the individual from the cradle to the grave. That had ruined some countries; it would ruin this to the extent that it was persevered with. Of one thing he was sure, that if these restrictions were continued we should grow up—talking about physical and mental degeneration—into a nation of molly-coddles. His objection to the clause was that it would not in any way decrease the evil complained of. He was absolutely sure that it would increase it. Take a child, for instance; when he had attained the age of sixteen years, assuredly he would become a confirmed smoker out of bravado; to show that he had recovered his freedom he would get into the habit of smoking. Talk about the poisoning qualities of cigarette smoking! It had been said that the evil arose from the habit of smoking cheap cigarettes which were provided by the million for the youth of the country. But if these cheap cigarettes were analysed, how much nicotine would be found in them? It would be found that in the penny packet of cigarettes there was an infinitesimal amount of nicotine. And if there was no nicotine in them, how could there be nicotine poisoning? One objection he had to this clause, besides all others, was that it would increase the practice of cigarette smoking. They could not go against human nature. If a boy were told that he must not do a thing, his first instinct would be to consider how he could set about to do it. It was an instinct, and any boy worth anything would act in that manner. There was an extra charm, moreover, in anything that was forbidden by law. Forbidden by the parent was one thing, bidden by the law was another, latter would inevitably increase consumption of these cigarettes. already been said, this was class legislation in the worst form. It was a class legislation got up by society member of which, or nearly member, could get all their wants supplied, but who seemed to have pleasure in arranging that their less brethren should not have their wants supplied. They talked about the rights of a child, but it was not the child who was fined, it was the parent. On the first occasion there was a fine, on a second offence there was a fine. Were not the poorer classes of the country handicapped enough? They must begin in this superior House of Commons to legislate in this way, and this the Government's democracy, so it was not an expression of democracy that he was taught to believe which he still believed in. It was the parent who would have to pay, and if he could not pay he would have to go to prison. For what? Because his child had been on the street or public place had been smoking a cigarette. He said that the clause was not worthy of our Legislature, was not even worthy of argument, only of ridicule and contempt. The only consolation was that this clause was a dead letter. If it were in operation they would want to double the number of the police, because they would be going to make a third of the population of this country criminals, criminals before the law, criminals. The Government were to do the deadly injury to the morality by setting up a standard of crime which included that which was no crime in the eyes of the working classes, and the working classes would be unable to distinguish between what was a real and what was a crime. They would in this way do a great damage to their morality, one of the greatest dangers of the age, to confuse the difference between crime and what could only be considered as a breach of a bye-law. By this therefore, the Government would do a stab at the morality of the working classes. They would teach the poorer working classes that it was of no consequence whether they broke in and whether they smoked a cigarette was bad in very great moderation for children. He defied anyone to produce any specific evidence in support of the statement that the smoking of a single cigarette, for instance, by a child of fourteen, did the least harm in the world. That being so, they had to approach this subject from that side of the House exactly as they would approach any other unwholesome practice for children. The question was, was this a wise way of dealing with it? He did not believe that the clause would have the least effect. He believed that a boy, if he wished to get tobacco, would get it somehow, and would smoke, and no clause making it a penal offence for a boy to get tobacco would have any real effect. His hon. friend the Member for North Antrim had pointed out that they could not stop compulsorily the sale of tobacco by post. There was no means of doing it. There was nothing to prevent a boy either writing himself or getting somebody to write for him, to a merchant to send him a packet of tobacco. The addition of the cost of postage was not a very serious matter when they considered the amount that could be sent by post for a penny. If a boy wished to smoke, the penalty for doing so would only increase his ardour to indulge in it. What was more likely than that to do him harm? They had been told that this was a growing evil and that something should be done to stop it. There was no more dangerous frame of mind in which a Legislature could approach such a question. But why was this tobacco smoking becoming a great evil? Hon. Members on the other side of the House never asked themselves why it was that those evils affecting the young began, and why it was that they were more flourishing now than they were thirty or forty years ago. They had a great career of progressive legislation during that period. They had provided for compulsory education and all sorts of regulations for dealing with children. They had very largely put the State in the position of the parent, and yet they were told that this was a growing evil. And they proposed still further to take away the legitimate natural authority of the parent and substitute for it the wholly illegitimate and ineffective authority of the State. That was a vice which they on that side of the House opposed. It was an offence against all legitimate legislation. Moreover, it did not accomplish what it proposed to accomplish. It effected a great many more evils than it attempted to cure. He hoped that the House, even at that stage, would not pass the clause, which he was convinced would do harm; and he trusted the House would support the Motion of the hon. Baronet.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said he would like to say a few words on this clause, although they were all conscious that it would have no effect on hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would not follow his hon. friend behind him on the effects of tobacco smoking, even in moderation. But they should look at the result of smoking on the part especially of the poorer classes of the country, at the manner in which it sweetened friendship and passed away the bad hours of poverty and hunger. [MINISTERIAL ironical laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but this was a Bill framed by and with the ideas of the well-to-do classes for dealing with the poorer classes of the country. He thought, however, that most hon. Members would agree as to the social advantages and comfort smoking had given. It promoted a good, friendly feeling, and because it was a comfort to so many was one reason why it should be done away with in the opinion of certain persons. It was a revival of the old Puritan feeling about putting down bear-baiting, not out of consideration for the bear, but because the Puritans suspected that the bear-baiting gave some pleasure to the spectators. He would not go into the merits of smoking. He did not smoke cigarettes himself. He did not care about them. His only objection to good cigars was that they were expensive. He did not think that they did him any harm, although for a considerable number of years he had tried his best in the direction of both pipes and cigars, and he could say that, on the whole, he had benefited from smoking them. The faddists might say that they were no good; that they must not drink, smoke, or do this, that, and the other thing until their lives were so limited that one wondered that they thought it worth while living at all. Health was injured in many other ways—by discontent, by various drawbacks, and troubles which they might regard as come down that day to attack the Bill— [Several HON. MEMBERS: Not the Bill, this clause.] Well, if they took away this clause they might as well drop the Bill. He believed that there would be thousands of parents up and down the country who would be pleased if this clause were passed because it would assist them in protecting their children. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of other days when the children had no such opportunities of getting and earning money that they had to-day. Parents and everyone who had anything to do with children would support them in passing this clause. It would be a blessing to the children and remove a great temptation. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken against all the facts of science and learning and the medical evidence brought before the Committee. There might not be so much nicotine poison in one cigarette. But it was not one cigarette, it was one after another and an accumulation of the poison that was the evil. He hoped his hon. friend would remain firm on this point in spite of the opposition to the clause, and he appealed to the House to think of the little children and help to remove this temptation that so demoralised them. The waste of money was evil enough, but behind that, and worse than that, there was the ruin of the health of the children. The noble Lord had stated that every argument used with regard to the children applied to adults, but there was at least one that did not. Smoking stopped the growth of children. He implored the House, as one who had the interest of the children at heart, to support this clause. Although he himself was a light smoker he might say he did not commence to smoke until he was fifty years of age.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said that unlike the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, he was not even a light smoker. He neither smoked, nor had he ever indulged in the practice. The question before the House was whether they ought to embody in an Act of Parliament, in a very imperfect and incomplete form, one broad recommendation with regard to the treatment of the young, and whether if they did so they would carry out in the smallest degree the object they had in view. Everyone knew that since the medical world, and following it the general public at large, had devoted themselves to the question of hygiene, any narrow views, sometimes quite inconsistent, taken as to the proper method of adult life alone, but even more of life. He believed the questions upon were of the profoundest importance. He had not the smallest doubt that young and especially the very young of this country suffered from the ignorance of their parents—especially mothers—as to the best kind of treatment they ought to have in their tender years. It was not a question of poverty, although, of course, that came in. Entirely outside poverty there was a single person who had followed the discussions who did not know according to the large schools of instructed medical opinion, most of the things were done to the young by their parents through sheer ignorance? There was no attempt to deal with the present case; they were attempting to deal with what was not a vice but an indulgence which they thought ought to begin till the human being was an adult. He would not discuss how far smoking was injurious to a person under sixteen or over sixteen. Everybody knew that even after sixteen there were people who were greatly over-smoked, who produced what was called a "smoker's heart," and who brought upon themselves important ailments by indulging in tobacco. But the numbers of women who smoked were increasing. Smoking was accepted in ordinary life in a manner in which it was not twenty years ago. He had no slightest doubt that the increase in juvenile smoking of which the hon. Gentleman complained was due to the imitation by the young of the practices of their elders, which was universal and was embodied in the nature. If their parents smoked they themselves thought it was nothing to smoke and a manly thing. Then an Act of Parliament would stop it. But how were they to deal with this question of smoking? There was one school of medical opinion who thought the people of the present generation were not suffering from under-feeding but from over-feeding—from indigestion and over-feeding. He had a friend who had a great deal of trouble to look at the actual methods of life among the

Mr. S. Collins.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood), in moving to insert, after the first word "person" the word "knowingly," said that the purpose of the Amendment was clear and obvious on the face of it. It was to ensure that the penalties, disabilities, and very serious consequences which the clause entailed upon a certain person should not be imposed upon him without his "knowingly" committing the offence constituted under the Act. This Amendment was essential unless very grave and serious injustice was to be done in practice so as to bring a reproach on the House and on the law itself. The object of the clause was to prevent boys from smoking cigarettes in public places. For his part, he did not believe that it could be done; but if one believed that it could be done it should be done with reasonable care for the very serious and vital interests of those who would be involved by this legislation. It appeared to him that as the clause was drawn, the whole burden, risk, and responsibility would rest not upon the parent mainly, not on the boy mainly, but upon the small retailer who sold the cigarettes. If it were assumed that it was an evil and a wrong thing to smoke cigarettes, then, he maintained, the responsibility should be put on the parent or guardian, who, however, got off. The next responsible person, no doubt, was the boy himself, but he got off with a reprimand. The one man whom this clause would strike at inevitably every time, was the tobacconist. He was certain that the form of offence here set up against the tobacconist was entirely new and very extraordinary, because, unless he entirely misapprehended the effect of the clause, this man might be and must be, if the clause were to operate at all, haled before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction and charged with a crime which it might be shown he had neither knowledge that he was committing nor intent of committing. His knowledge of the retail tobacco trade was nil, and he had no interest in it; but it appeared to him to be a very strange thing indeed to hale a man before a Court and brand him as a criminal and perhaps ruin him in business and reputation because, in the rush of business that went on in those small shops where cigarettes were sold, a man might not have carefully looked at two or three boys who came into his shop, or having honestly exercised his best judgment he had come to the conclusion that they were not "apparently" under the age of sixteen. He did not suppose that any hon. Member would desire to screen a man who, knowing what he was doing, chose to do it for profit, or any man who, having reasonable cause to know or being in a position to have reasonable cause to know that the boy was under the age of sixteen; but unless the word he desired to put in the clause was inserted, a man might be ruined, if not financially, in reputation and in business, for doing a thing which at the time he committed it he did not know was a crime. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 14, after the first word 'person,' to insert the word 'knowingly.'"—(Mr. Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'knowingly' be there inserted."—(Mr. Bowles.)

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not understand whether the hon. Member proposed to substitute for the word "apparently" after the second "person" the word "knowingly" after the first "person." The hon. Gentleman could not have both words.

SIR F. BANBURY said he intended to move to leave out "apparently" afterwards.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he gathered that the consequential Amendment would be moved to leave out "apparently" after the word "knowingly" had been inserted. He would point out that the effect would be to make the clause absolutely unworkable. It could rarely be proved that the tobacconist knew that the boy was under the age of sixteen. He would always say that he did not know that the boy was under sixteen. They must deal with a tobacconist who had reasonable cause to know that the boy was under sixteen. He pointed out that in a great number of statutes precisely this form of words was adopted—of using "apparently"

then they would not prevent him by saying that he was not to smoke in public. If, on the other hand, all they meant to do was to prevent the unpleasant sight of a rather sickly-looking youth smoking what was obviously a most detestable cigarette with the air of one who was lord of all he surveyed, then, really, the machinery of legislation ought not to be used to do it. Conceive the feeling of a boy when he knew he was perfectly safe if he smoked in any spot which could not be described as a public place. He would only have to walk through the gate of a field when he saw a policeman approaching; he might lean over the gate and puff his cigarette in the face of a policeman until he had finished it. Could any greater amusement be provided for the rising generation than that of being able to smoke a cigarette in a public place, and if one saw a policeman approaching, to move off a dozen yards through a gate, continue to smoke one's cigarette until it came to an end, and then walk out, taking off one's hat to the guardian of the law? If their object was to prevent physical deterioration of the race, surely legislation of that kind would be absolutely useless. He could not but think that the Government were lapsing into a procedure which had long been discredited. His hon. friend the Member for the City of London had remarked that in his younger days this kind of legislation was disbelieved in by both sides of the House, and he himself thought that to be absolutely true. In the Middle Ages, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, exactly the same kind of legislation was passed. They believed seriously at that period that by this kind of legislation one could perform some miracle in forming the habits of the population; and they were always passing Bills—not that any human being took the smallest notice of them after they were passed, but because they were an evidence of the good intentions and high objects of the Legislature which passed them. The Under-Secretary in the middle of his excellent speech, in answer to a question which was interpolated as to the result of the legislation in the Colonies, said that to deal fully with that question would take too long, and that there had been no desire to repeal the legislation. Legislation of this kind was not repealed; it was ignored. It was difficult to repeal legislation. It roused a considerable opposition; it led to debates. Therefore, he quite understood that if they passed this legislation it probably would not be repealed. It would be absolutely ignored. That would happen. Here and there a mischievous boy would amuse himself by making fun of a too zealous constable. But that Parliament would, in the passing of clauses like this, alter the taste for nicotine, and the imitation of that taste, by that Parliament, was really grotesque. The orator thought that Parliament could not do that. It could not create a feeling that something was immoral. If they based their legislation upon an already existing feeling of immorality, they might be able to express that feeling practically, but to suppose that by merely putting a Bill they were going to create a public opinion which was required in order to make their Act operate was the most fantastic illusion, and it was constantly haunting the legislators and legislatures. The orator expressed his belief that the Government had fallen into that method. The Gentleman who had just sat down had asked whether any change had come over the feelings of the Opposition regard to the Bill as a whole. The change had come over the feelings of the Opposition. He did not think that to undervalue the admiration which the hon. Gentleman expressed for the Bill had done in furthering its progress. Probably, he had found a good deal to like in the provisions embodied in it, and the Home Office. Of course, the Bill as a whole met with the assent of both sides of the House, but with their warm approval. But this particular group of clauses had no connection with the Bill as a whole. He could not help feeling that the hon. Gentleman had not in any way endangered his Bill by adhering to these clauses, he and the Government acted quite fairly by the House in introducing suggestions of so contradictory character in the middle of a Bill which, in its main provisions, was quite uncontroversial. Everybody understood that the Opposition could not absolutely prevent this Bill passing into law without the smallest difficulty. Closure by compartment was not a Bill of over 130 clauses could be passed by consent; and that could were anxious to give and meant to give ; but it was rather abusing their anxiety to see useful legislation passed to interpolate something so alien to the general spirit of legislation in that House—legislation which, however excellent in intention, could not have the smallest effect on the habits of the young, legislation which created crimes which did not now exist, legislation which would be a constant and chronic incentive to all the high-spirited youth of the country to add to the rather unfortunate habit of imitating their elders by indulging in the practice of premature smoking, the additional pleasure of defying—in a matter in which morals were not in the least concerned—this meddlesome legislation which the Government insisted on passing. It was, he supposed, too late after the speech of the Under-Secretary to make an appeal, but when the Government depended upon the Opposition for passing their Bill they spoke with some claim to general consideration, and he asked the Government whether they did not think that if legislation of this kind was to be passed at all it should be passed separately, so that the House might pronounce upon its merits. It was consistent neither with the best interests of the country, nor with the traditions of legislation in that House, to interpolate controversial clauses wholly outside the ordinary legislative practice of the House, which so large a section of the public thought would be entirely inoperative for the progress of those it was intended to benefit, and which, so far as the public were concerned, could be productive of nothing but evil.

MR. GLADSTONE thought that no one in the House would complain either of the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's observations or of his criticisms. The Government had recognised from the first that there were strong arguments against the provisions now proposed. The right hon. Gentleman had said that they ought, in regard to this particular Bill, to remember the views and opinions of the Opposition, and, seeing that the Bill was a very long one and was not controversial, it ought not to be impeded by the introduction of clauses so highly controversial. But he would like to point out that the Government had no reason to apprehend that these clauses would in fact be considered as highly controversial. They were in the Bill from the start ; they had been considered in Grand Committee ; they had been under public notice for a very long time, and he was bound to say that the opposition to them which had been developed to-day came to him very much as a matter of surprise. He was prepared for criticism, and he might say for an adverse vote. He was referring not so much to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but to the language of high denunciation, the declaration that these clauses were directed against liberty, that they meant the police force would have to be doubled, and other statements of that sort, which appeared to him to be not only highly coloured but—he did not wish to say anything offensive—almost a grotesque exaggeration. There had been a double argument. The right hon. Member for Bordesley had taken the pessimistic view that these clauses would lead to all sorts of terrible effects ; and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition summarised what he considered would be the results by saying there would be no result at all, that the machinery of the Bill would be impossible, and that the effect of it would be a dead letter. He thought that argument answered in great measure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley. There could not be any interference with liberty if there was to be no particular effect at all—no result of the Bill. But he did not wish to press that argument beyond a certain point. The two real questions they had to consider were these—first, was the practice of smoking by the very young bad ; was it a habit which was growing and threatening the health of the nation ; and, in the second place, was it their duty to endeavour to provide a remedy, and was the remedy proposed adequate for the purpose ? These were the questions they had to consider. He thought boys smoked cigarettes because they liked it. They did not smoke pipes and cigars. If they did, nature would have its revenge. He remembered smoking cigarettes himself at an early age, and liking it very much.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : In a public place ?

MR. GLADSTONE said the definition of a public place was so very difficult that he could not answer the question. When he was a boy, what was a casual practice had now become a very common habit. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone questioned whether there was any weight of scientific or medical evidence to prove the evil of cigarette-smoking. Surely it was a fact that whether medical opinion could be relied on now or in the future, it had declared with force and conviction that smoking in excess was bad for all, that smoking in excess for the young was perhaps the worst thing possible, and that smoking even moderately had a bad effect on the health of young persons. He would recall to the recollection of the House a rather significant general order which was issued in March by General Grenfell in Ireland. He was not an emotional faddist, but a man who kept his eyes open, and had the health of his soldiers greatly at heart, and would only act in a practical and commonsense way. He said in this general order—

“The commander of the forces has, during recent visits to military hospitals, been again struck with the harm that the increasing prevalence of cigarette-smoking is doing to the health of the Army. It is not confined to the Army, and Parliament is likely soon to deal with it as affecting the national health. Lord Grenfell appeals to the Irish Command to give earnest and early thought to combat what is gradually but greatly affecting its efficiency, and he requires all commanding officers to impress on those under their command the evils that must inevitably ensue from this excess.

“With a view to helping men to overcome the habit the commander of the forces directs the smoking of cigarettes to be prohibited at certain times when, on the other hand, no similar restriction as regards pipe-smoking will be made; the smoking of cigarettes, therefore, will not be permitted while men are on fatigue or under arms on any occasion, including field operations and manœuvres.”

He believed similar orders had been issued in other commands. The military authorities had, in their manual dealing with health, dealt with the matter, and had issued in their Memorandum to soldiers a series of warnings on the subject. He understood it was found that young soldiers who had taken to cigarette-smoking, and had largely abandoned smoking pipes, had in consequence developed heart troubles, and now special precautions were being taken. was a special danger in cigarette-smoking which had so far developed as to endanger the efficiency of soldiers and lead to a large number of rejections in the case of recruits. What was true of these young soldiers, a fortiori true of still younger boys who had the habit. He did not think they could carry the matter any further. He believed the evil was admitted. The question was, were these proposals necessary and would they be of any effect. Their intention was to co-operate with the parents. They agreed that the parent was and ought to be the authority, but the mischief was that the boys smoked under the eyes of the parents and had no power whatever over them. The boys under the present law had perfectly unlimited powers of purchasing tobacco, and the very worst quality that was sold. They proposed to co-operate with the parents by saying the tobacco seller must not sell tobacco of this kind to boys. These proposals necessarily be open to criticism from the boys who indulged to the same mischievous extent in the practice of smoking cheap cigarettes did not, in fact, get their tobacco by post, and very much doubted if they would in the future if the Bill was passed. The Government anticipated that the Bill would have a practical effect because it proposed to co-operate with the parents in dealing with what was admittedly a growing evil. His hon. friend had announced modifications in Clause 1, and had told the House that he was going to proceed with Clause 2. The right hon. Gentleman would agree that they had paid that tribute to the House of the Opposition. But they were convinced that this was an evil which really required to be dealt with, and could not make further concessions of any material kind. They believed something was necessary, and these proposals were the best that could be devised. He agreed there were imperfections in them, but if any hon. Member could suggest a better mode they would be only too glad to consider it. But, so far as concerned, these clauses represented the most effective action that could be taken, and he hoped, therefore, that would support them in maintaining them as announced by his hon. friend.

VISCOUNT MORPETH (Birmingham, B.) said the right hon. Gentleman was under some misapprehension with regard to what took place in Grand Committee. There were many Members of the Committee not on one side of politics alone, who resisted these clauses most strenuously—Members who had given a general support or a friendly neutrality to the Government. They recognised that the Under-Secretary had made a very considerable concession: to their mind the clause that the Under-Secretary proposed to omit was the most mischievous of all, because it brought a boy, through what was no moral fault, into the meshes of the law and into the police Court. He was grateful to the Under-Secretary for striking that out. He did not want to say anything about the general principles of liberty and compulsion. Compulsion was often very necessary and useful, and liberty should be very qualified when they were dealing with the young. Liberty was by no means altogether a blessing for those who had not come to years of discretion, and he did not base his opposition on that ground; but the clauses were mischievous because they would not and could not be enforced. From their very earliest years boys would be accustomed to flout and disobey the law generally, with very slight or no consequences to themselves, and cigarette-smoking, though a bad habit, was of less account than that boys should be enabled to disregard the law. The Home Secretary said it was the desire of the Government to co-operate with the parent. If the parents and the schoolmasters in elementary schools chose to enforce the powers which were legitimately theirs it would be perfectly possible to put down smoking amongst young boys. It was very remarkable that a boy should be a habitual cigarette-smoker, and the parent not be aware of the fact. If the parents were zealous in the matter, and schoolmasters cared to co-operate, it was perfectly easy to put down smoking without calling in the arm of the law. He would like to ask whether the Government considered drinking or cigarette-smoking the worse. In their general legislation they were going as far as possible to prevent the adult from drinking, but they were not going to prevent him smoking. Under their legislation for children they allowed a child to drink beer after the age of fourteen, and did not allow him to smoke up to the age of sixteen. According to that arrangement of ages it appeared that they considered cigarette-smoking worse for young boys than the drinking of alcohol. He disclaimed the idea that seemed to exist in the minds of some people that smoking and drinking had anything to do with one another. There were very many excellent persons who thought it dangerous to allow boys to smoke because it led to drinking habits, but there was no evidence of any sort that there was any connection between drinking and smoking. He thought it a great pity that the two matters should be drawn into connection, and that smoking should be considered vicious or even morally wrong, and that therefore they should make an ill-considered and ill-advised attempt which was doomed to failure.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said he would not attempt to maintain the debate at the level it had reached, or to follow his noble friend in the ethics of the question whether smoking and drinking were connected, though he believed those who did not smoke did not want to drink before going to bed at night. He was in favour of lessening temptation—indeed, he would vote for its total abolition—and he was grateful to the Government for excising Section 41, and for the Amendments they had introduced into Section 39, which had made it more workable, and to him, personally, far more palatable. Every Member who had spoken had been so far personal in his remarks that he had referred to his own habits as regards smoking, therefore he made no apology for saying that tobacco was a weed which was to him absolute poison. Neither had he been converted from his belief that juvenile smoking was extremely injurious. He had lived in countries where brown babies alternately applied themselves to their mother's breasts and their mother's cigars. Anyone might see that in Burmah every day of their lives, and it was possible that to the children of that country the early practice of smoking was not so injurious as he believed it was to the youth of this country. But he did not think because one took that ground it would be any justification for joining the ranks of those who "compounded the sins they were inclined to by damning those they had no mind to." He believed juvenile smoking was an extremely injurious practice. But to make things crimes was another affair. He would like to know if it was the case that if a boy of sixteen or under sold a cigarette paper which might or might not be used for the purpose of rolling a cigarette, he would actually be liable to a fine of £5, and that, if he could not pay, his father would be liable to go to prison? With all anxiety to stop juvenile smoking that seemed to be rather a severe provision, and the section was pretty stiff. It was quite conceivable that a boy might sell some of those cigarette papers to another boy for the purpose of rolling up alley tors or commoneys, or other toys or marbles that boys used. It seemed too much to make the passing of cigarette papers like this an offence. Personally he would be rather glad if the section were amended, and made a little more lenient than it actually was. However, he had heard expressions of dissent and disapproval on that side of the House at the action of the Home Secretary in excising Section 41. Therefore he took the opportunity of saying there were some on that side who thought it was a wise and a moderate course to cut this out, and were grateful to the Government for having done it. The fact was that one might be very anxious to abolish temptation. It was an admirable objective, but it was not very easy of attainment. It seemed to him that to multiply these offences, and to create so many crimes was rather a serious matter. When one clause after another came before the House, and provisions, already severe enough, were stiffened up, he could not help thinking of the great writer who said—

"The more corrupt the Republic the more numerous the laws."

Those who thought as he did were as anxious to preserve the children from smoking and drinking as those who thought differently. But the fact that the truth had been summed up by the writer who said—

"How small of all that human heart That part which kings or laws can cure."

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon) entirely agreed with the motion with which the hon. Member concluded his speech, and he was not at all in favour of pushing legislation too far, and interfering with and lessening the force of that moral law which ought to be, and he hoped increasingly be, brought to bear and applied to people not of mature age required protection by law. It was a very serious question, and they must be very careful how they rushed into it. After the evidence of several commissions quoted by the Under-Secretary, it was practically unanimous that this was the most serious evil, and that it required some serious way of dealing with it. He should certainly support the clause now stood. He believed the Government looked for it, and he believed that the mere legal force of it it would be an example and a lesson which the country thought was necessary. He believed it would not be used in a punitive way, and that it would be a great encouragement to parents and schoolmasters in checking this system which they thought to be a national danger.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries) regretted extremely that the Home Secretary had made the concession he had announced, and he thought he had gained much up to now, because the debate had not been shortened. He regarded the smoking of cigarettes as a great evil, and the mere selling as only a part of the operation. He felt it was scarcely fair to put the penalty on the man who sold the cigarettes when they still allowed children to smoke. The giving of a cigarette, too, was as bad as selling, and anyone who encouraged the habit of cigarette smoking among children was doing just as much harm to the growing race as a bacconist. He regretted also that the Under-Secretary had announced his intention of dropping Clause 41, and with the Amendment which he had on the Paper, there was the very valuable provision that he brought into touch the parent, who was to be informed that the child had been found smoking. He regarded it as a most valuable Amendment that the first approach to the subject was not even a reprimand or a fine, but an intimation to the parent that the child had been found smoking. In the majority of cases the parent might have been trusted to deal with the child in such a way that the offence would not be repeated, especially as he would know that if it were repeated he would have to come to the Court with the child and stand beside him when on his trial. He regretted very much that that provision was given up, because he felt that without the co-operation of the parent not much good would be got. But, still, he should certainly vote for the clause, and he was not very sure whom its opponents were speaking for. He had received from nobody any objection to the clause, and he thought it was a great deal to the credit of the tobacco trade that they had entered so loyally into the proposals of the hon. Gentleman. They had scarcely got the credit they deserved. Hon. Gentlemen on both sides who were opposing the clause were doing so more on theoretical than on practical grounds. Some hon. Members had talked about the making of public opinion on the subject, but the public opinion was made. He did not think hon. Gentlemen were aware of the strength of public opinion, and the very strong feeling that those who had to do with children had upon the subject. It was the voluntary workers, who were trying to put down this evil by moral suasion, who found all their efforts checked for want of legislation, who were asking for these provisions, and he hoped the House would encourage them in that desire.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) and the hon. Gentleman asked what was the reason for the opposition to the Bill, and whether they had received any suggestions from outside the House. He had heard some startling statements in that House, but that was the first time he had heard that the activities of a Member of Parliament were to be governed entirely by representations from people outside. Obviously, so long as people were freely elected, and were not merely the delegates of others, it was their duty to offer those criticisms which occurred to them as the result of their experience and knowledge, quite irrespective of representations made to them from outside. Some reference had been made to the apparent change in the attitude of the Opposition, but both the Home Secretary and the hon. Gentleman behind him, who entirely ignored the fact that many who had taken part in the debate had not had the opportunity of taking part in previous discussions on the Bill, and when hon. Gentlemen opposite found fault with some of those who spoke because they said they were not familiar with every clause of the Bill, they were assuming to themselves virtue to which he believed they had not the smallest claim. He believed the great majority of Members opposite would find themselves quite unable to answer questions on the various clauses of the Bill, which was only one out of many Bills with which they had been called upon to make themselves familiar. The fault consisted in putting into a Bill of this kind, which in itself was not controversial, and which, in regard to its main provisions, had the goodwill of everybody in the House, objectionable proposals of this kind, which, if they could be justified, and they had not yet been justified by any of the arguments they had heard, ought to be embodied in separate Bills and produced in such a form that the House understood what it was doing. He did not believe, until they came to this part of the discussion, that a fifth of the House of Commons had the faintest idea what was the legislation they were called upon to pass. So long as this kind of thing happened, so long it would be found on the Report stage that a very different attitude from that which was adopted before the Committee would be taken up in the House. He had no idea that these clauses were in the Bill. He was not a member of the Standing Committee which dealt with the measure upstairs, and he had been reading other Bills in the discussion of which he had been called upon to take part. To read every clause of every Bill introduced was absolutely impossible

SIR F. BANBURY moved to amend the same clause by substituting twelve for sixteen years as the apparent age of a person to whom it should be an offence to sell tobacco. He did not think it was necessary to elaborate this point, because sixteen was a good age at which a boy might be allowed to smoke without injury.

*MR. RAWLINSON in seconding the Amendment said the object of the section was to prevent people under sixteen from smoking. To put into this clause the age of sixteen was a great hardship. This was a section which made it an offence to sell to any person apparently under the age of sixteen, tobacco or cigars, and, in view of that fact the limit ought to be considerably under the age at which it became criminal to smoke. By this proposal they were putting a very severe restriction upon people who sold tobacco. Surely there ought to be some margin between the age at which it became penal to smoke and the age at which they were entitled to sell. If they made it penal for the tobacconist to sell to anybody under the age of sixteen they would find great difficulty in enforcing the Bill because the sympathies of the public would not go as far as the Bill proposed. He thought the Government might well accept this or some similar Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

“ In page 23, line 15, to leave out the word ‘ sixteen ’ and to insert the word ‘ twelve. ’ ”—
(Sir F. Banbury.)

. Question proposed, "That the word sixteen ' stand part of the clause."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL expressed his obligation to the hon. Baronet for moving his Amendment so succinctly. He could not follow the arguments of the hon. and learned Member opposite that it was necessary to have a different age in Clause 39 from that which was contained in Clause 40. If they considered it was wrong for a person under the age of sixteen to smoke it was equally wrong for a tobacconist to sell to a person under that age, and the most natural thing to do was to fix the same age in both cases. He did not see why they should fix a different age for the selling of tobacco. As for the undergraduate who looked under sixteen and might be refused cigarettes, such undergraduates would not be frequently seen either at Oxford or Cambridge. The proposal contained in ~~this Bill~~ followed the recommendation of the ~~Committee~~ <sup>mis-</sup>sions who ~~had~~ <sup>had</sup>

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 Frederick Banbury and Mr.
 Lupton.

LORD R. CECIL, in seconding, appealed to the Under-Secretary to accept this Amendment because it would not make any serious difference to the Bill. If in point of fact the cigarettes were bought by a person for his own use an offence would be committed, but if they were genuinely bought for somebody else an offence would not be committed, and he submitted that that was not an unreasonable provision. The Under-Secretary would see the great difficulty in which he was placed by forbidding altogether the sending of boys to a tobacconist. By Section 43 anybody who could afford to keep a servant would be free from the effect of the clause. It was rather singular that if they wished to send for tobacco or a large cigar they could send a boy, but if they wished to send for a cigarette or a cigarette paper an offence would be committed. Surely that was very unreasonable, and it would not be the wish of the Under-Secretary to lay down that working men might smoke cigars or tobacco as much as they liked, and send their boys for them, whilst he forbade them sending their boys for cigarettes or cigarette papers. A very grave question would arise under Section 43. If a boy was in one's service one would be entitled to send him. The Under-Secretary knew the great difficulty of deciding who was in a person's service and who was not. It would be quite easy to arrange that a boy should be technically in a person's service, and the moment they had done that they would be free to send him to any tobacconist in the kingdom for cigarettes. Those words really formed part of the Bill when the Under-Secretary had in mind a different conception of what he required by legislation. A great many exceptions had been made, and the Under-Secretary would do well to accept this Amendment, which would not affect the working of the Bill and would go a long way to meet the views of those who were opposed to this clause.

Another Amendment proposed to the Bill—

Question proposed, "That the word 'whether' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that from the first a distinction had been drawn between cigarettes and other tobacco. The natural course, no doubt, would be to say that no cigarettes, or tobacco, or cigars should be sold to any person under the age of sixteen. But what were the circumstances with which they were faced? The case of the man who sent out his boy to fetch some tobacco was one which they were anxious to meet, because, on the one hand, while they wanted to stop the evil of juvenile smoking, believing that in the interest of the population that was necessary, they did not want to say, merely because they wanted to stop the smoking of cigarettes by boys, that a working-man who wished to stay at home might not send out his boy for an ounce of tobacco for his pipe. On the other hand, if they were to say that cigarettes might be sold to a boy, unless the tobacconist knew that they were for his own use, as the Amendment proposed, they would be putting into the Bill a provision which would be obviously inoperative. There might be some cases in which it could be proved that the tobacconist had reason to know that the cigarettes were for the boy's own use, but they would be very rare. He asked hon. Members not to look at this Amendment from the point of view of general hostility to the clause. If what they wanted was a clause which would really stop juvenile smoking, would it be of any use to say that a tobacconist should not sell cigarettes to a boy for his own use, but might sell them if the boy said that they were not for his own use? If they did so, the clause would be inoperative. On the other hand, were they to say that no tobacco should be sold to any child whether for his own use or not? That would be very harsh on a parent who could not send his boy to buy tobacco. After all, the evil with which they had to deal was not that of little boys who smoked cigars. They were dealing with the widespread and growing evil arising out of the practice of little boys smoking cigarettes. The Bill provided that a tobacconist might not sell other tobacco to a boy if he knew that it was for the boy's own use, but he admitted that the provision was likely to be frequently acted upon. There might be cases in which a tobacconist knew that for any man. When this Bill came before them on the Report stage he read it, and for the first time he then became aware of the fact that these clauses were in it. One or two previous speakers had asked a question which had not been answered. He thought it was a question which ought to be answered by the Irish Attorney-General. Reference had been made to language which occurred in Clauses 39 and 40. The words referred to sales to a person "apparently under the age of sixteen years." He was no lawyer, but it appeared to him that the introduction of those words meant that a very wide discretion was to be given to the police in uniform, and that in the event of their action being unjustified the words would be used to guard them from any charge that might be levelled against them. He imagined that was the reason why the words were put in. He only wished to make that comment upon it. They had heard, from time to time—not so much from that side of the House as from other quarters—criticisms passed upon the police with regard to the performance of their duties. If they were going deliberately to create new crimes, and give to the police so wide a discretion as was to be given by the language of the clauses referred to, then the least they could do was not to complain of the way in which they were doing their work, and to realise that Parliament was putting on them an invidious and difficult task. He thought it would be better to make it clear that the offence only arose when a sale was made to a child under sixteen years of age, and that the word "apparently" should be left out. He did not know whether the word had been introduced in previous Acts of Parliament. His recollection was that in previous cases the limitation was to children under a particular age. He did not think the word "apparently" had been used.

THE ATTORNEY - GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange) said that under Clause 39 the offence consisted in selling to a person under sixteen years of age. If a boy was apparently over that age, but, as a matter of fact, was under the age, the vendor could not be convicted. The provision was, he thought, a very useful one. Some boys at fifteen years of age looked eighteen or nineteen.

MR. WALTER LONG said that was not really what he asked, but, almost unconsciously, the right hon. Gentleman had answered what he asked. Shortly, the answer amounted to this. The clause allowed vendors to be guided in regard to age solely by their judgment of the appearance of the persons buying.

MR. CHERRY thought that so far as Clause 39 was concerned the effect was certainly that the vendor could not be convicted if he dealt with a boy who, as a matter of fact, was under sixteen, if in appearance he was more than sixteen. In Clause 40 the word protected a constable or a park keeper if he seized any cigarettes or cigarette papers from a boy who, though over sixteen years of age, was apparently under that age. Really the word "apparently" in the two clauses had a different effect. The hon. Member for North Armagh had referred to the bearing of Clause 39 on sales by post. The words of the clause did not apply to sales by post. If a vendor sold tobacco by post, he sold it in the ordinary course, and he could not be convicted. It was quite true that they could not stop every possible means open to boys for buying tobacco and cigarettes. They had dealt with one or two ways of restricting the sales.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL (Dublin University) said it seemed to him that the Attorney-General for Ireland, in defining the word "apparently," had furnished the House with the strongest possible argument for the omission of Section 39, because if he was right in what he said as to the true effect of the word in that section, and if he was right in the view that it meant something diametrically opposite to what it meant in the following section, then all he could say was that it was a very great hardship indeed to impose on the vendors of tobacco liability to a penalty in the way proposed.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that if it was found that a boy who was apparently under sixteen was in fact over sixteen, the tobacconist could not be penalised.

in the parks. There was no clause which interfered with girls smoking in the parks. If the words proposed to be left out were taken from the clause, then it would read that the offence was to sell to a messenger for his own use. It had been stated that on the medical evidence given before the Commission it did not appear that there was any smoking among girls amounting to a national evil. If there was no smoking among girls it was obvious that cigarettes sold to a young girl would not be for her own use. Take the case of a father who had no sons, and who might want to send his little girl to buy cigarettes for his own use. Unless there was the exemption proposed by the hon. Baronet, the father could not do that. It would be absurd to suggest that a little girl of twelve years of age wanted to buy cigarettes to smoke herself. He thought that if a child could be sent out to buy candles, meat, or any other household commodity, it should not be made an offence to sell a little girl a packet of cigarettes, where no danger of her using them herself might be apprehended. He pressed the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to accept the Amendment.

*Mr. CAVE thought they were all agreed that the law on this subject ought to be simple and clear. If a boy fifteen years of age went into a tobacconist's shop and said that his father or his employer had sent him for a packet of tobacco or a cigar of some size, because a small cigar had not yet been defined, the tobacconist might serve him; but if the boy said that his father had sent him for a packet of cigarettes or a small cigar, then no sale could safely be made. An exception was to be made in the case of a boy messenger in uniform and employed by a company, but not in that of a page-boy in uniform employed by a private individual. Was not that perfectly absurd? Was it not making a distinction which had no real foundation in reason and which would lead to a considerable hardship on tradesmen? Then, how was a tradesman to know whether a cigar was small or large? There was no definition as to its length or thickness.

pieces, for the purpose of smoking them; or to buy tobacco and then make it into cigarettes themselves. A simple way of dealing with the difficulty would be to make the proviso in Clause 44 apply to all tobacco sales. That was to say, that if a tradesman was satisfied in his own mind that a child was not going to smoke the tobacco or the cigar he might sell it to the child. That was a reasonable precaution to take to protect the child, and, at the same time, to allow people to send their children to buy cigarettes for them.

*Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL said that the prohibition of the sale of cigarettes to children must be made absolute in order to be made effective. An exception had been made in the case of boys sent by a messenger company, but that was no reason why he should make other concessions in the case of other boys.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS asked how the concession of the hon. Gentleman would affect the great majority of towns and villages where no district messengers existed?

*Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL said that in these places the father could not send his son for cigarettes; he must send someone other than a child. As a matter of fact, cigarettes were not smoked so frequently as tobacco by the working classes. An exception had been made in the case of messenger boys employed by a company to meet an exceptional case, but he did not see why that concession should be made use of in order to destroy the efficacy of the remainder of the Bill. That was what the acceptance of the Amendment would do.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said that the hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to consult public convenience by making the concession in the case of page boys or uniformed messengers of a messenger company, but he thought it was unfair and unreasonable to give an advantage to a small public, and deny it to

 Frederick Banbury and Mr.
 Lupton.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood), in moving to insert, after the first word "person" the word "knowingly," said that the purpose of the Amendment was clear and obvious on the face of it. It was to ensure that the penalties, disabilities, and very serious consequences which the clause entailed upon a certain person should not be imposed upon him without his "knowingly" committing the offence constituted under the Act. This Amendment was essential unless very grave and serious injustice was to be done in practice so as to bring a reproach on the House and on the law itself. The object of the clause was to prevent boys from smoking cigarettes in public places. For his part, he did not believe that it could be done; but if one believed that it could be done it should be done with reasonable care for the very serious and vital interests of those who would be involved by this legislation. It appeared to him that as the clause was drawn, the whole burden, risk, and responsibility would rest not upon the parent mainly, not on the boy mainly, but upon the small retailer who sold the cigarettes. If it were assumed that it was an evil and a wrong thing to smoke cigarettes, then, he maintained, the responsibility should be put on the parent or guardian, who, however, got off. The next responsible person, no doubt, was the boy himself, but he got off with a reprimand. The one man whom this clause would strike at inevitably every time, was the tobacconist. He was certain that the form of offence here set up against the tobacconist was entirely new and very extraordinary, because, unless he entirely misapprehended the effect of the clause, this man might be and must be, if the clause were to operate at all, haled before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction and charged with a crime which it might be shown he had neither knowledge that he was committing nor intent of committing. His knowledge of the retail tobacco trade was nil, and he had no interest in it; but it appeared to him to be a very strange thing indeed to hale a man before a Court and brand him as a criminal and perhaps ruin him in business and reputation because, in the rush of business that went on in those small shops where cigarettes were sold, a man might not have carefully looked at two or three boys who came into his shop, or having honestly exercised his best judgment he had come to the conclusion that they were not "apparently" under the age of sixteen. He did not suppose that any hon. Member would desire to screen a man who, knowing what he was doing, chose to do it for profit, or any man who, having reasonable cause to know or being in a position to have reasonable cause to know that the boy was under the age of sixteen; but unless the word he desired to put in the clause was inserted, a man might be ruined, if not financially, in reputation and in business, for doing a thing which at the time he committed it he did not know was a crime. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 14, after the first word 'person,' to insert the word 'knowingly.'"—(Mr. Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'knowingly' be there inserted."—(Mr. Bowles.)

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not understand whether the hon. Member proposed to substitute for the word "apparently" after the second "person" the word "knowingly" after the first "person." The hon. Gentleman could not have both words.

SIR F. BANBURY said he intended to move to leave out "apparently" afterwards.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he gathered that the consequential Amendment would be moved to leave out "apparently" after the word "knowingly" had been inserted. He would point out that the effect would be to make the clause absolutely unworkable. It could rarely be proved that the tobacconist knew that the boy was under the age of sixteen. He would always say that he did not know that the boy was under sixteen. They must deal with a tobacconist who had reasonable cause to know that the boy was under sixteen. He pointed out that in a great number of statutes precisely this form of words was adopted—of using "apparently" and not "knowingly." It was employed in the Pawnbrokers Act of 1872. In the Pawnbrokers Act there was a section which laid it down that they should not deal with anybody apparently under the age of twelve, and in the Intoxicating Liquors Act of 1872 a licensed person was prohibited, under a penalty, from selling to any person apparently under the age of sixteen years. The word "knowingly" was not there, and it was the law of the land operating that night in every public-house all over the Kingdom, by which publicans were debarred from selling to persons apparently under the age of sixteen. Then, again, there was the Explosive Substances Act, where provision in regard to the sale to children was in precisely the same words. Lastly, it was provided that general dealers should not sell to or purchase from any person apparently under the age of fourteen, whether he was acting on his own behalf or for any other person. Therefore, the draftsman had followed the ordinary form of words, which had not given rise to any trouble, and would not give rise to it. If the word "knowingly" were inserted no conviction could be obtained unless it was in the case of some very small child indeed. For that reason it was impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment, as it would make the clause absolutely useless.

Amendment negatived.

SIR F. BANBURY moved the omission of the word "apparently." He presumed it was the object of the Government, having obtained the clause, to make it as workable as possible, and to inflict as little hardship as possible on people who would be convicted under the Act. The Under-Secretary had told them of certain Acts of Parliament in which the same word was used, and said that no hardship had arisen in those cases. Of course, the Explosives Act was not an Act very often used in the case of children, and, therefore, the necessity to quote it hardly arose. The Intoxicating Liquors Act was no doubt an Act which might apply to children, but unless he was very much mistaken in the Sale of Liquor to Children Bill, which was passed some five or six years ago, the word "knowingly" was put in instead of "apparently." He remembered, he thought it was last session, the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean making some remarks upon the bad drafting of a clause which was then before the House. He was told by the member of the Government in charge of the Bill that there was a precedent for it in such-and-such an Act of Parliament, and when the right hon. Gentleman later on in the same debate objected again to the drafting of the Act he was met with the same answer. His reply was that he did not know that there were so many Acts of Parliament so badly drafted, but the fact that there were was no reason why the Government should bring forward another Bill also badly drafted. He thought that was an excellent argument, and it seemed to him unanswerable. There was no reason why, because they made a mistake in 1872, they should perpetuate it in 1908. Then the hon. Gentleman had told them that if a man was prosecuted for an offence under this Bill and the child turned out to be over sixteen years of age, there would, of course, be no conviction. But if the Under-Secretary would turn to Section 122, subsection (2), he thought he would find he was mistaken.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL asked if the hon. Member would look at subsection (4).

SIR F. BANBURY said he would like to look at the other one first. If the hon. Gentleman looked at subsection (2) he would find these words—

"Where on a charge or indictment for an offence under this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule of this Act, it is alleged that the person by or in respect of whom the offence was committed was a child or young person or was under or above any specified age, and he appears to the Court to have been at the date of the commission of the alleged offence a child or young person, or to have been under or above the specified age as the case may be, he shall for the purposes of this Act be presumed at that date to have been a child or young person or to have been under or above that age as the case may be unless the contrary is proved."

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the hon. Member ought to emphasise those towns like Liverpool and Manchester, where it would be almost impossible for him to find out the age of a particular customer. In the Bill, the only offences were those of selling to children under age, but in this section, apparently, there was no limitation as to age.

MR. BONAR LAW (Camberwell, Dulwich) said that this was a point on which there really ought not to be any difference of opinion. It simply had reference to the best way of dealing with the matter in question. His right hon. friend behind him had shown in the clearest possible way that by the clause, as it stood, the burden of proof rested on the trader who sold the material. That was a point the hon. Gentleman had not dealt with. It was true, as the hon. Gentleman had said, that there were precedents both ways, but that was not the point. The point was, what was the best thing to do, and, in the nature of things, the fair way in which to deal with this matter. The hon. Gentleman said it was impossible for the prosecutor to find out the age of a person; if that were so, how in the name of common-sense was the tobacconist to find out what the age of a person was? Further, the hon. Gentleman had said that it was rather an advantage if they made the law that the tobacconist was not to sell to anyone unless he had a beard or a big moustache, who was quite safe, and a long way above the age. He suggested that they should adopt the proper course, the course adopted in almost everything, to assume that a man was innocent until he was proved to be guilty, and put the burden of proof on the prosecutor, and not on the man who sold.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) said, anxious and willing as they were to protect children, they had also to consider, in connection with a section like this, that common justice should be done to a large number of tradesmen. They had to remember the thousands of people in this country who were doing a perfectly legitimate business in selling tobacco and cigarettes. They had no right, in their endeavour to put an end to juvenile smoking, to adopt a clause which would do a gross injustice to the whole of the tobacconists in the kingdom. They had no right to place them in the position of being presumed to be guilty of an offence unless it was really the fact that they were guilty. It was for the prosecution to make out that the actual offence of selling cigarettes to a person under the age of sixteen had been committed. As had been pointed out, there was the further defence that if a tradesman was able to show that his customer was apparently over that age it would obviously meet the justice of the case. For these reasons, he strongly supported the Amendment.

LORD R. CECIL said he could not support the Amendment for the reason that it seemed to him that if this word were struck out, and it happened that the person to whom he sold was under sixteen, the tobacconist who sold cigarettes by post would then be guilty of the offence and have no defence at all. Again, a much simpler case, if a boy sent an older brother into a shop to buy for him cigarettes, in law the transaction would be with the younger brother and the tobacconist would be guilty of the offence. He quite appreciated the difficulty raised by his hon. friend, although he would not be able to vote for his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

Question proposed, “ That the word ‘ apparently’ stand part of the Bill.”

*MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) contended that if this Amendment was successful, a valuable protection would be withdrawn from this trade. He had no doubt that the word “ apparently ” was a protection to the trader. He also had no doubt that the existence of the appearance of the age would be a matter of fact to be found by the tribunal, and not a matter for the judgment of the trader. It was quite true that it had a curiously different effect in the two clauses. The intention was that the child should be sixteen years old and should look sixteen. There were then two conditions that had to be satisfied. In this clause this word operated to the protection of the trader and the smoker. In the next it made for the protection of the smoker alone, because it made it more difficult for the policeman to intervene. The reason for this was that the draftsman had adopted a circuitous method of saying a simple thing. He might have said: “ Any person being and appearing to be sixteen,” instead of which he had said something else which was capable of the construction that a person who was over sixteen, but who looked under sixteen, should be a person who should not be able to buy tobacco. The result was that in some obscure clause miles away it was necessary to put in qualifying words. The trader was in a better position with this word “ apparently ” than he would be if the word had been “ knowingly.” He hoped the Amendment would not be accepted.

MR. CHERRY said the word “ apparently ” protected the trader and no one else. In the case of a boy who was really under the age of sixteen, but who looked eighteen, and who came in and bought cigarettes, the trader, when prosecuted, would immediately defend himself by the appearance of the boy. In the converse case of a boy over sixteen, but who appeared to be under that age, the vendor by proving the boy’s age would be able to escape the charge. In both cases the word “ apparently ” was only applicable to the vendor, and could not apply to anybody else. The right hon. Gentleman opposite and hon. Members who moved and seconded the Amendment admittedly did so in the interest of the tobacconist. If they took this section and Section 122 together, and the two cases he had mentioned, they would see that in both cases the vendor was protected.

MR. LAMBTON agreed that the vendor was protected, but called attention to the effect of this word on the public. The unfortunate youth who was eighteen, but who looked younger, would not be allowed to buy cigarettes at all. If people looked younger than sixteen, the tobacconists would refuse to serve them. They would go into the tobacconist and say they wanted a packet of cigarettes, and the tobacconist would say: “ You look under the age of sixteen, and I cannot serve you.” That would be a distinct infringement of the liberty of the subject. Those who were over, but who looked to be under the age of sixteen, had a perfect right to go into a shop and demand to be served with tobacco. This word was no good, and might, he thought, be left out.

SIR F. BANBURY called attention to the fact that the Attorney-General for Ireland had forgotten to deal with the case of the boy who was under sixteen, but who looked eighteen. Such a boy might go in and be served with a packet of cigarettes. Some person who knew his real age might see this done and give information to the police. The police might then prosecute the tobacconist for selling cigarettes to a boy apparently under the age of sixteen. The defence of the tobacconist would be that the boy looked eighteen. The magistrates might admit that he did, and, having turned to Section 122, might say: “ As he appears to us to be over sixteen years of age we do not convict.” But the prosecutor would then point

 Frederick Banbury and Mr.
 Fell.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to amend the same clause by substituting twelve for sixteen years as the apparent age of a person to whom it should be an offence to sell tobacco. He did not think it was necessary to elaborate this point, because sixteen was a good age at which a boy might be allowed to smoke without injury.

*MR. RAWLINSON in seconding the Amendment said the object of the section was to prevent people under sixteen from smoking. To put into this clause the age of sixteen was a great hardship. This was a section which made it an offence to sell to any person apparently under the age of sixteen, tobacco or cigars, and, in view of that fact the limit ought to be considerably under the age at which it became criminal to smoke. By this proposal they were putting a very severe restriction upon people who sold tobacco. Surely there ought to be some margin between the age at which it became penal to smoke and the age at which they were entitled to sell. If they made it penal for the tobacconist to sell to anybody under the age of sixteen they would find great difficulty in enforcing the Bill because the sympathies of the public would not go as far as the Bill proposed. He thought the Government might well accept this or some similar Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 15, to leave out the word 'sixteen' and to insert the word 'twelve.'"—
 (Sir F. Banbury.)

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL expressed his obligation to the hon. Baronet for moving his Amendment so succinctly. He could not follow the arguments of the hon. and learned Member opposite that it was necessary to have a different age in Clause 39 from that which was contained in Clause 40. If they considered it was wrong for a person under the age of sixteen to smoke it was equally wrong for a tobacconist to sell to a person under that age, and the most natural thing to do was to fix the same age in both cases. He did not see why they should fix a different age for the selling of tobacco. As for the undergraduate who looked under sixteen and might be refused cigarettes, such undergraduates would not be frequently seen either at Oxford or Cambridge. The proposal contained in the clause followed the recommendation of the Commissions who had discussed the subject point—that under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and that under the Licensing Acts, the Pawnbrokers Act, the Metal Dealers Act, and the Explosives Act. The Criminal Law Amendment Act dealt with offences not in the slightest degree analogous to those which occurred under the other Acts. It dealt with grave crimes for which the penalty ran up to penal servitude for life—crimes which must be the subject of indictment, and in which, since the question often turned on the precise age of the person concerned, it was rightly required that there should be strict proof from the beginning as to whether the girl was under sixteen or thirteen, according to the section under which the proceedings were taken. Now the other statutes, on which the present Bill was modelled, had reference to the selling of spirits or liquors to children, to the dealings of pawnbrokers with children, to the transactions of metal dealers with children, and to the dealings of sellers of explosives with children. Surely, those were precisely analogous cases to the sale of cigarettes to children. In all these cases, if the person was apparently under age, then there was a prima facie case against the seller which he might be able to rebut by absolute proof that the child was over the age of sixteen or fourteen, or whatever the age might be, and if he could not rebut it, then he was liable to a penalty. That was the common-sense view of the case. If they had these young persons going into shops to buy these things, they could not require the police, before the prosecution took place of the tobacconist who sold the tobacco, to get proof by a birth certificate. It would be impossible for the Act to be worked at all if that were required. They must have a common-sense clause.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL asked how it was proposed that the merchant should supply the proof of age if the prosecutor could not give the age.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: He would put it the other way. If the merchant could not give this evidence how could the prosecutor?

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL: The prosecutor could get it.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: So could the seller; the two were on the same footing. But as a matter of fact, even supposing that two persons, apparently under the age of sixteen, but actually somewhat older, were unable to get cigarettes, really, he thought that would be a very good thing. The very fact that they were under size, and looked less than their real age, made it inadvisable that they should be served with cigarettes. After all this was a class of case in which above all it was desirable that the sale should be prevented. If injustice were done on either side, he should prefer it on that side rather than the other. If the word “apparently” were left out of the clause it would be made absolutely unworkable, and for these reasons he must decline to accept the Amendment.

MR. MOORE asked the Attorney-General for Ireland to consider subsection (2) of Clause 122.

MR. CHERRY: Four.

MR. MOORE: The hon. Member for the City of London had also referred to subsection (2) of Clause 122, in considering this word “apparently.” He commended the consideration of this subsection to the House, for he thought they would find it absolutely unintelligible. It said—

“Where in a charge or indictment for any offence under this Act, etc., it is alleged that the . . . child or young person was under or above any specified age . . . he shall for the purpose of this Act be presumed . . . to have been a child or young person . . . under or above that age, as the case may be, unless the contrary is proved.”

The clause put in an alternative which made it absolutely meaningless. Applying that clause to the case of a tobacconist who had been charged, would the Minister inform them how he was to arrive at the presumption that the child was under age, or, as the section said, above the age at the time. It was a very important difference for the tobacconist, because the onus of proof was upon him to prove his innocence, which was contrary to the practice of the country. It threw upon him the onus of proof in circumstances in which it was very difficult for him to get documentary evidence, especially in

LORD R. CECIL, in seconding, appealed to the Under-Secretary to accept this Amendment because it would not make any serious difference to the Bill. If in point of fact the cigarettes were bought by a person for his own use an offence would be committed, but if they were genuinely bought for somebody else an offence would not be committed, and he submitted that that was not an unreasonable provision. The Under-Secretary would see the great difficulty in which he was placed by forbidding altogether the sending of boys to a tobacconist. By Section 43 anybody who could afford to keep a servant would be free from the effect of the clause. It was rather singular that if they wished to send for tobacco or a large cigar they could send a boy, but if they wished to send for a cigarette or a cigarette paper an offence would be committed. Surely that was very unreasonable, and it would not be the wish of the Under-Secretary to lay down that working men might smoke cigars or tobacco as much as they liked, and send their boys for them, whilst he forbade them sending their boys for cigarettes or cigarette papers. A very grave question would arise under Section 43. If a boy was in one's service one would be entitled to send him. The Under-Secretary knew the great difficulty of deciding who was in a person's service and who was not. It would be quite easy to arrange that a boy should be technically in a person's service, and the moment they had done that they would be free to send him to any tobacconist in the kingdom for cigarettes. Those words really formed part of the Bill when the Under-Secretary had in mind a different conception of what he required by legislation. A great many exceptions had been made, and the Under-Secretary would do well to accept this Amendment, which would not affect the working of the Bill and would go a long way to meet the views of those who were opposed to this clause.

Another Amendment proposed to the Bill—

Question proposed, "That the word 'whether' stand part of the Bill.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that from the first a distinction had been drawn between cigarettes and other tobacco. The natural course, no doubt, would be to say that no cigarettes, or tobacco, or cigars should be sold to any person under the age of sixteen. But what were the circumstances with which they were faced? The case of the man who sent out his boy to fetch some tobacco was one which they were anxious to meet, because, on the one hand, while they wanted to stop the evil of juvenile smoking, believing that in the interest of the population that was necessary, they did not want to say, merely because they wanted to stop the smoking of cigarettes by boys, that a working-man who wished to stay at home might not send out his boy for an ounce of tobacco for his pipe. On the other hand, if they were to say that cigarettes might be sold to a boy, unless the tobacconist knew that they were for his own use, as the Amendment proposed, they would be putting into the Bill a provision which would be obviously inoperative. There might be some cases in which it could be proved that the tobacconist had reason to know that the cigarettes were for the boy's own use, but they would be very rare. He asked hon. Members not to look at this Amendment from the point of view of general hostility to the clause. If what they wanted was a clause which would really stop juvenile smoking, would it be of any use to say that a tobacconist should not sell cigarettes to a boy for his own use, but might sell them if the boy said that they were not for his own use? If they did so, the clause would be inoperative. On the other hand, were they to say that no tobacco should be sold to any child whether for his own use or not? That would be very harsh on a parent who could not send his boy to buy tobacco. After all, the evil with which they had to deal was not that of little boys who smoked cigars. They were dealing with the widespread and growing evil arising out of the practice of little boys smoking cigarettes. The Bill provided that a tobacconist might not sell other tobacco to a boy if he knew that it was for the boy's own use, but he admitted that the provision was not likely to be frequently acted upon. But there might be cases in which a parent knew that in the parks. There was no clause which interfered with girls smoking in the parks. If the words proposed to be left out were taken from the clause, then it would read that the offence was to sell to a messenger for his own use. It had been stated that on the medical evidence given before the Commission it did not appear that there was any smoking among girls amounting to a national evil. If there was no smoking among girls it was obvious that cigarettes sold to a young girl would not be for her own use. Take the case of a father who had no sons, and who might want to send his little girl to buy cigarettes for his own use. Unless there was the exemption proposed by the hon. Baronet, the father could not do that. It would be absurd to suggest that a little girl of twelve years of age wanted to buy cigarettes to smoke herself. He thought that if a child could be sent out to buy candles, meat, or any other household commodity, it should not be made an offence to sell a little girl a packet of cigarettes, where no danger of her using them herself might be apprehended. He pressed the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to accept the Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE AYES.—
 Master of Elibank and Mr.
 Herbert Lewis.

*MR. CAVE thought they were all agreed that the law on this subject ought to be simple and clear. If a boy fifteen years of age went into a tobacconist's shop and said that his father or his employer had sent him for a packet of tobacco or a cigar of some size, because a small cigar had not yet been defined, the tobacconist might serve him; but if the boy said that his father had sent him for a packet of cigarettes or a small cigar, then no sale could safely be made. An exception was to be made in the case of a boy messenger in uniform and employed by a company, but not in that of a page-boy in uniform employed by a private individual. Was not that perfectly absurd? Was it not making a distinction which had no real foundation in reason and which would lead to a considerable hardship on tradesmen? Then, how was a tradesman to know whether a cigar was small or large? There was no definition as to its length or thickness. The clause as it stood would only encourage children to smoke large cigars or to buy large cigars and to cut them into small pieces, for the purpose of smoking them; or to buy tobacco and then make it into cigarettes themselves. A simple way of dealing with the difficulty would be to make the proviso in Clause 44 apply to all tobacco sales. That was to say, that if a tradesman was satisfied in his own mind that a child was not going to smoke the tobacco or the cigar he might sell it to the child. That was a reasonable precaution to take to protect the child, and, at the same time, to allow people to send their children to buy cigarettes for them.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that the prohibition of the sale of cigarettes to children must be made absolute in order to be made effective. An exception had been made in the case of boys sent by a messenger company, but that was no reason why he should make other concessions in the case of other boys.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked how the concession of the hon. Gentleman would affect the great majority of towns and villages where no district messengers existed?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that in these places the father could not send his son for cigarettes; he must send someone other than a child. As a matter of fact, cigarettes were not smoked so frequently as tobacco by the working classes. An exception had been made in the case of messenger boys employed by a company to meet an exceptional case, but he did not see why that concession should be made use of in order to destroy the efficacy of the remainder of the Bill. That was what the acceptance of the Amendment would do.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said that the hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to consult public convenience by making the concession in the case of page boys or uniformed messengers of a messenger company, but he thought it was unfair and unreasonable to give this advantage to a small section of the public, and deny it to others.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said he gathered that the objection of the Under-Secretary to the Amendment was that if it were adopted it would give tobacconists an opportunity of evading the penal clause of the Act. The tobacconist would be able to say that the boy had come into his shop and bought the cigarettes, stating that they were for his father or someone else, and that he had served him on that footing. They were all agreed that it was very desirable to prevent juvenile smoking, but they might be excused for taking a little extra time over this penal clause, seeing they were not dealing with boys or girls, but with the penalty to be imposed on the tobacconist. The clause as it stood would lead to some ludicrous results. Supposing he sent his son or a boy in his employment to a tobacconist for the purpose of purchasing a large cigar, or a packet of tobacco, the tobacconist could sell it; but if he sold the boy a small cigar or a packet of cigarettes there was a penalty. He thought that few people could form a very intelligent idea of the penalties which would be incurred in conducting the business of a tobacconist. If he sent a boy messenger in uniform, who by the way only existed in London—[At this point a woman ran into the Chamber within the Bar, and exclaimed: "Leave off discussing the children's question, and turn your attention to the women first." The woman was immediately carried out of the House by one of the attendants.] What he desired to point out was that of all the juveniles who indulged in smoking the very worst were those belonging to the Boys' Messenger Brigade, and yet these were the boys of whom the Under-Secretary had made an exception, and allowed to be sold cigarettes and small cigars. If in Liverpool, where there were no message boys in uniform, he sent a messenger to buy cigarettes, that would be an offence; but if he sent him to buy a large cigar there would be no offence. Undoubtedly at the present moment the working classes of this country did not consume large quantities of cigarettes, but smoked tobacco in pipes. On the Continent, however, things were very different, and the habit of cigarette-smoking among the working classes might very easily be brought to this country. He had, indeed, himself noticed a very large increase of the practice of smoking cigarettes on the part of adults. He did not think the Under-Secretary's argument was sound that if they stopped the selling of cigarettes to boys they met the whole difficulty with which they intended to deal. Boys would smoke a small or large cigar, or anything which happened to be rolled up in tobacco-leaf. He would also point out in this connection this curious fact, that if a small cigar contained cabbage leaf there would be no offence, because in order to constitute an offence it had to contain tobacco. Therefore, it would be a good defence on the part of a tobacconist to say: "This is not tobacco; it is some weed, and entirely an imitation." At all events he suggested that if under this penal clause they were going to inflict these penalties of £2, £5, and £10, it ought to be proved to the Court at the time the penalty was inflicted that the sale was actually made to the juvenile for his own use. He very strongly supported this Amendment, and it seemed to him that when they were exacting a penalty they ought to prove the offence, and it could not be proved if a young boy or girl was sent by a parent or anybody else to purchase cigarettes. They had a perfect right to send him, and it was a gross interference with the liberty of the subject and with the trade of a large number of tradesmen that offences should be manufactured in this way, and that they should incur a penalty unless it could be shown by the prosecution that the intention of the young persons was to smoke the cigarettes themselves. He proposed to support the Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
Frederick Banbury and Lord
Robert Cecil.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to amend Clause 39, by leaving out the words dealing with the giving to a young person of cigarettes or cigarette papers.

LORD R. CECIL seconded.

Amendment proposed—

“ In page 23, line 16, to leave out from the word ‘ not ’ to the word ‘ he ’ in line 19.”—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, “ That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill.”

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL accepted the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to omit Clause 40 (Forfeiture of tobacco). He said he did not know whether the Under-Secretary would accept the Amendment, but he was afraid he was not going to be so reasonable, as he was in regard to the last Amendment. The effect of this clause was to give power to a constable or a park-keeper, or other person having the powers of a constable, and being in uniform, to seize any cigarettes or cigarette papers in the possession of any boy, apparently under the age of sixteen, whom he found smoking in any street or public place. First of all, he thought they were putting a very hard task upon the police and park-keepers. The park-keeper or a policeman saw a boy whom he thought was under sixteen, and he was to be the judge in that matter. A constable or park-keeper might have a grudge against a certain boy, and he might arrest him because he said he thought he was under sixteen. That appeared to him to be an illegal offence. The boy might say he was over sixteen, and that he could prove it, yet nevertheless he would be taken to the police-station and charged because he was apparently under the age of sixteen, and because he was a young-looking lad the Court would decide that the constable was right. The result would be that the boy would be discharged, but would have no right of redress. He thought the clause was a very dangerous one. The duties the police carried out were very difficult, and they carried them out with great tact, and no one would wish to put them at loggerheads with the people and make them unpopular with a large section of the population. That was one reason why he objected to this clause. Then he noticed that the clause said—

“ It shall be the duty of a constable and of a park-keeper or other person having the powers of a constable, and being in uniform, to seize any cigarettes or cigarette papers in the possession of any boy apparently under the age of sixteen.”

He wished to know why the word “ boy ” was suddenly interpolated in this clause. In every other clause he understood the words were “ a child or young person.”

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The point arises on a later Amendment.

SIR F. BANBURY regretted it should be the fact, but he believed it was a fact that at the present time many women did smoke, and what they smoked was cigarettes, and if it was necessary to stop the smoking of cigarettes by any one under the age of sixteen, it was as necessary to stop girls as boys.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) suggested that the hon. Member should look at the next Amendment on the Paper in the name of the Under-Secretary to leave out the word “ boy ” and insert the word “ person.”

SIR F. BANBURY said that that certainly disposed of his objection upon that point. But it was only another instance of the careless drafting of the Bill. After all, one could only go by the words in the Bill. But to come back to the police constable and the seizure of cigarettes in the possession of any boy who was found smoking in a public place. It had been pointed out by one hon. Member that if a boy was smoking a cigarette in a field he might lean over the gate and puff his smoke in the policeman's face, and that after he had finished his cigarette he could safely come into the road. The same argument applied to many places besides a field. It applied to the area of a private house. What was to prevent a boy, when he saw a policeman coming, going into an area and smoking? It also applied to the doorway of a house, and in the poorer districts the doors of the houses were frequently open. The effect of this clause was that, though a boy might smoke in the open doorway of his father's house, he might not smoke on the pavement a few feet away. It was absolutely absurd. Where was the harm of smoking in a public place as against a private place? The deterioration of the boy was the same in each case. He thought it would be well in the interests of the Bill if the hon. Gentleman left out what he might call these little nagging clauses. It must be remembered also that the difficulties of the constable would be increased because the person found smoking would, in the majority of cases, be near the age of sixteen. The constable would, therefore, find himself in a very difficult position, and in all probability he would look the other way if he saw a cigarette in a young person's mouth. It had been said over and over again, that all the clauses which had been discussed that day would become a dead letter, but he went further and said that if this sort of clause was insisted upon the whole Bill would become a dead letter because it would become ridiculous. No constable would take any step in a case in which he thought it would be difficult to obtain a conviction. He observed that there was no penalty in this clause, and if there was no penalty that in itself was a strong reason for deleting the clause. A boy of eighteen who looked young might be seized by a police constable who might say: "You are smoking; I must search you."

LORD R. CECIL: No, no.

MR. CHERRY: There is an Amendment to prevent searching.

SIR F. BANBURY said that in that case, so far as he could see, the Government having put down a clause and having subsequently put down Amendments to render it nugatory, it was unnecessary for him to do more than move the omission of the clause. He begged to move.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.), in seconding the Motion, said he had abstained from taking any part in these discussions because he thought the hon. Gentleman in charge of the measure had made so many concessions that all the efficacy of this clause had disappeared. All that remained now was the fact that a tobacconist might not sell, except under circumstances which there was ample scope for evading, cigarettes to a person apparently under the age of sixteen. That was as far as the House had legislated at present. They had spent a great many hours, a lamentable waste of time, upon an excrescence of the Bill which was no part of the Bill, and which ought never to have been brought into it. What remained was that they were going to give power to the police officer or park constable, or anybody who wore a uniform to molest boys and young women in the streets. He very much regretted that the Under-Secretary had reinserted the provision which allowed no sexual distinctions. The hon. Member had previously in the Committee assented to young women being liberated from the indignity of a search. Although the hon. Gentleman now eliminated "search," he imposed on young women who might be smoking in the streets the indignity of having snatched from them by force any cigarette they might be smoking or any cigarette paper in their hand. He thought if such a thing happened to a respectable young woman in the streets of London something more would be heard of it. But how ineffective the whole thing was. First they had to get the young person smoking a cigarette in the street, and then they had to catch him. A boy was supposed to know the law. The boy seeing the constable coming immediately concealed the cigarette he was smoking, or the cigarette paper he had in his hand. And because a boy or young woman apparently under the age of sixteen was seen smoking they were to be exposed to the indignity of an assault. How many young women within the acquaintance of hon. Members themselves were there not who were over sixteen and looked younger? Besides, the number of fish they were going to catch with this net was so very small that it was really idle to put this machinery in motion. He had as a lawyer some experience of various Acts, and he submitted that it would be a dangerous violation of the spirit of our laws that they should allow an officer of a certain class of life to take on himself to put the law in force without any judicial inquiry. That was a very dangerous power to confer, and he thought it was a power which might be abused. He could conceive, even if the power were bona fide exercised, that high-spirited lads would very much resent action of this kind. He knew that his noble friend opposite was theoretically in sympathy with the idea of stopping juvenile smoking, and he was very much inclined to agree with him in the view that this Bill was well intended; still, he did not think they ought to risk entrusting these powers to police officers and park-keepers, having regard to the indefiniteness of the provisions, and how little they would stop smoking. He thought they were exposing children to danger; they were inviting breaches of the peace; they were causing great annoyance; they were presenting temptations for the exercise of overbearing authority to persons who were not necessarily police officers, but whom they endowed with these powers; and he thought his hon. friend would be well advised if he were to do away with these powers which he proposed to confer. It was on the whole a wholesome provision to say to a shopkeeper that he must not sell cigarettes or cigarette-papers to young children, and in regard to that the hon. Gentleman, he thought, had reached far enough. But under provisions for the chance cases of boys smoking in the streets, they would have lads offering themselves up as sacrifices: or, with that cunning which belonged to boys, and which they were supposed to lose when they became older, they would be able to scent the policeman and to hide the cigarette or cigarette-paper. This provision invited policemen and park-keepers, who were not immaculate, to molest, interfere with, and annoy persons, and still more to molest, interfere with, and annoy those whom they might choose to think had cigarette papers or cigarettes, or intended to smoke, or were smoking. He gathered that his hon. friend had his doubts about this kind of legislation, and he appealed to him, in order that the Bill might be made as little annoying and as little irksome as possible, to drop this clause. He did not think it would hurt the provision against the shopkeepers, which was an excellent one on the whole, and he would meet the feeling of those who had a strong objection to any interference with individual liberty by conferring on inferior ministers of the law powers which should only be exercised by persons occupying a very much higher and more responsible status.

Ame-dment proposed—

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out. to the word ‘boy’ in page 23, line 27, stand part of the Bill.”

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London had raised several objections to this clause. In the first place, he objected to the word “apparently” under the age of sixteen, saying that it would be very hard on the policeman or park-keeper to have imposed upon him the duty of deciding whether a boy was above or below that age. The word “apparently” was put in for the protection of the policeman and park-keeper. It would be far harder upon him if the word were omitted and the clause were to read that a policeman or park-keeper should seize cigarettes in the possession of any boy under the age of sixteen, whom he found smoking in any street or public place.

because then he might make a mistake owing to a person who apparently was far below the age subsequently proving to be above sixteen. The hon. Member who had just spoken, and the hon. Baronet who moved the Amendment, objected to the clause on the ground that it was impossible to enforce, by means of the agency of the law, minute regulations of this kind. The duties of policemen and park-keepers were not concerned only or even mainly with the suppression of grave forms of crime. They performed many functions of a minute character quite analogous to this. A boy who played pitch and toss did an illegal act, and the policeman had, not indeed to take away the money, but he had to take the boy before an ordinary police Court for that offence, and have him charged with gaming. That was one of the most frequent charges against juvenile offenders. Again, boys playing football in the street were guilty of an offence which the police had to and did suppress; and the damaging of shrubs and plants—a comparatively small offence—had to be stopped by park-keepers. All these were matters of minute detail which had to be enforced by the very class of people whom it was proposed to empower to stop smoking in the street by juveniles. The hon. Baronet had complained of the careless drafting of the Bill, pointing out that whereas in other clauses the word "person" was used, in this the word "boy" was employed. As introduced, the Bill used the word "person" in this clause, but in Committee grave objection was taken to the clause, on the ground that, since it would give power to constables to seize cigarettes in the possession of a girl, it impliedly gave the power to a policeman to search a girl, and in order to meet that objection he said in Committee he would omit the word "person" and insert "boy." Subsequent discussion revealed the fact that the Committee generally desired that it should be clearly stated that there should be no right to search at all, and the ultimate outcome was that he undertook to insert words that there should be on the part of the constable no right of search of any person found smoking in a public place, and that when that was done the word "person" should be reinserted in order to make the Bill uniform, and avoid any distinction between the sexes. The hon. Member who had just spoken had not been fair to the clause, because no action could be taken unless the person was actually smoking in a street or public place, and, if a girl was smoking in a street or public place, he did not think it would be so great an injury to personal liberty for a constable to go up to her and say: "You must not smoke, and I must take possession of your cigarette." The hon. Baronet wanted to know why they drew the line at a public place, and asked whether it was not just as harmful for a child to smoke in its father's house as in the street. No doubt it was, but, as a matter of fact, they could not stretch the arm of the law further than a public place or street. Many other things, deleterious and objectionable as they might be, were only offences if committed in a public place. No doubt the boundary of a public place, like all boundaries, might give rise to inconsistencies, but that was so merely because that was as far as any legislation could go. The hon. Baronet had objected to the clause because it inflicted no penalty on the child found smoking in the street or public place, but he was perfectly certain if there had been a penalty imposed the hon. Baronet would have objected and said it was intolerable. The proposal was based upon the recommendation of the Committee of the House of Lords, but there was no body, apparently, which aroused the contempt of the hon. Baronet more than a Committee of the other House. It was a fact that the House of Lords Committee had recommended this particular proposal, and it seemed to him to be a very useful substitute for prosecution. They were not going to impose any penalty at all upon the child who smoked in the street or public place, but he thought it was reasonable that a constable should be able to stop a child doing so in a public place, and thereby bring home to him the fact that smoking was regarded by the law as bad for him and objectionable, and so far from this making the policeman unpopular, he was sure nothing would be more welcomed by the public. On every hand one heard that it was absurd that little children should be allowed to go about puffing cigarettes and nobody have the power to stop them. The clause, after a long discussion, passed the Committee upstairs without a division, and in these circumstances he hoped the House would consent to its retention.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) thought the Under-Secretary ought not to move the Amendment which he had put on the paper taking away the right of search if he wished the clause to be efficacious. If the clause was to be a reality, the policeman must have the right of search. A policeman saw a boy fifty or sixty yards away obviously smoking. He went up to him and said: "I saw you smoking." Long before he reached him, however, the "fag" was out of the boy's fingers and in his trousers pocket. The right of search, if properly administered, would prove that the boy was smoking, but without it the clause would be utterly inoperative. There was a point raised on Clause 40 to which an hon. and learned Member had alluded and to which the Under-Secretary had made no reply. He had spoken as if the police constable were the sole authority for seizure. It was not only in the hands of experienced police constables that this duty was to be placed, but of any park-keeper or other person having the powers of a constable and being in uniform. There was considerable distinction between the various authorities. The ordinary police constable was a man who could be trusted to carry out the most difficult and delicate duties with extraordinary tact, good humour, and judgment; but the ordinary person, who by virtue of the fact that he was wearing a uniform was to be entrusted with the same duties, need not by any means have the same judgment and experience. He did not know what person had the same powers as a constable other than a constable. Certainly a park-keeper had not. A constable had far more extended powers than a park-keeper. He would like to know who the other persons were who actually possessed the powers of a constable.

LORD BALCARRES: But those are privately employed policemen.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: They are not constables within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

LORD BALCARRES said he objected to placing this duty in the hands of persons who were not subject to police laws. It was obligatory and not optional. The police had to deal with all sorts of minor offences. It was an offence to play football in the street if the result was to interfere with the traffic, and that was just where the ordinary police constable was given an option. But in this case no option was given. It was his duty to seize the cigarette, and there was bound to be a scuffle or a scrimmage. He did not think the good results they were going to get from this clause were worth the risk it involved. He had great hesitation in believing that any of these three clauses would check what he admitted to be a serious evil, but, in view of the fact that there was considerable ambiguity in the clause, that the duties of these persons were not adequately defined, that the persons themselves were by no means necessarily people with the experience and the skill of the ordinary police constable, he should support the Amendment moved by the hon. Baronet and vote against the clause.

LORD R. CECIL said this was really the most astonishing clause that had ever been proposed. He thoroughly agreed with the observation of the Under-Secretary that there was no danger of the clause making the police unpopular, least of all with boys under sixteen. He thought it would make them very popular and would give the boys a great deal of much needed amusement in the town districts. There was no right of search, and there were to be no legal proceedings. A boy was smoking a cigarette. He saw a policeman and went as near as he could to him and walked up and down in front of him to show that he was smoking a cigarette. The policeman called to him to give him the cigarette. "No," said the boy, "you come and take it." The policeman, if he was young, gave chase. The boy led him a tremendous chase, and eventually allowed the policeman to catch him when the cigarette was about a quarter of an inch long. Then he waited until the policeman was a yard or two off and lit another cigarette. Speaking from his recollections of boyhood he could not conceive what amusement he should have enjoyed more. He did not pretend to be so well acquainted with boys of the working classes as he was with some other boys, but he presumed boys were very much alike, and his belief was that nothing in the world would give them so much pleasure as this clause. If he had not been so well acquainted with the sober and steady character of the Under-Secretary, he would have thought this was a legislative practical joke, and that the Under-Secretary was coming out in the very unexpected light of a Parliamentary humorist. If that were the object of the clause he really thought the Under-Secretary would be entitled to their warmest congratulations. Under the circumstances, he felt compelled to oppose the clause. He was opposed to cigarette smoking by boys, but it was a ridiculous thing to make it a criminal offence, and he did not want the House to do something which would directly and deliberately encourage it. He was certain if the clause was passed in the form suggested without Clause 41, and they could not with any regard to justice pass Clause 41, the necessary effect would be to encourage smoking by boys, and he was quite certain every hon. Member who had considered the effect of the clause would agree with what he had said. Surely the clause showed more clearly than any argument could the absurdity of trying to make this a criminal offence. They were driven by the stress of the public opinion of the House of Commons and the Grand Committee gradually to whittle away their provisions until there was really nothing left that was of any use. They could not have desired more clear proof of the absolute accuracy of everything they had said about this part of the Bill, and he hoped when the Under-Secretary considered it impartially and carefully he would see that in its present form this part of the Bill would not only do no good but must do a great deal of harm, and he would either now or at another stage abandon the whole thing.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) said it was with very great reluctance that he put himself in opposition to any part of this great Bill, because he believed it to be a charter of deliverance for many children. He was equally reluctant to do anything to make more difficult the task of his hon. friend or to prolong the discussion on the Bill, because no one had a greater admiration than he had for the masterly manner in which he had piloted the Bill through Grand Committee and the House, and for the perfect temper and discretion he had shown on all occasions. He had voted more than once against these tobacco clauses, and he had some little shame that old-fashioned notions of Liberalism and liberty had been voiced so largely from the benches opposite rather than from those with whom he usually associated. He could not but believe that the whole of this proposal to create a sort of code, and penalise children and young people for what was not really a moral crime was an excrescence on the Bill, and was quite unnecessary. He recognised that there was a widespread desire to see less cigarette smoking amongst children, and he admitted that it was not desirable for children, and if practised to excess, was probably very injurious. Clause 39 was open to less objection than that they were now considering. There was something to be said for restricting the sale of cigarettes to children, but the provision of this clause appeared to be altogether indefensible and inoperative. He could not believe that any really good results, but some bad results, would follow from giving to constables, and park-keepers, railway policemen, tramway conductors, when in uniform, and so forth, the right to run after a boy who had a cigarette and take it from him. If they were denied the right of search, and could only take the cigarette which was actually in the boy's hand or mouth, or any packet which he might be kind enough to display in his hand, the clause would not be very effective. It exaggerated altogether the importance of the offence they were committing against society. It was not a bomb that the boy had in his pocket, though it might be from the way this legislation was framed. He was simply practising a habit of which a good many people disapproved. The whole object of the Bill and of the agitation against juvenile smoking had been to prevent excessive smoking which it was admitted was injurious to young children. In order to prevent excesses they were making it illegal for a boy under sixteen to smoke a single cigarette. He objected to the clause because it could not be enforced and would lead to deceit. The result would be that when a boy saw a policeman he would get behind a tree or in some dark place, and instead of smoking openly he would do it secretly. The penalising of trivial acts of this kind confused a boy's idea of what was lawful and what was unlawful. It should not be overlooked that they were proposing to mix up the offence of cigarette smoking with petty thefts. The Under-Secretary had already stated that he did not regard these clauses as essential to the Bill, and he had also stated it could not be alleged that physical deterioration was the result of cigarette smoking. Seeing that this clause would be inoperative and that Clause 41 had been taken away, and Clause 40 immensely reduced in its efficacy, he asked the Under-Secretary either to leave Clause 39 alone or part with the whole of these three clauses. He appealed to the Government to withdraw Clause 40 and allow it to keep company with its late companion Clause 41.

MR. LAMBTON said he desired to join in the request made by the hon. Member opposite that this clause should be withdrawn. Clause 40 provided that—

“ It shall be the duty of a constable and of a park-keeper, or other person having the powers of a constable, and being in uniform, to seize any cigarettes or cigarette papers in the possession of any boy apparently under the age of sixteen whom he finds smoking in any street or public place, and any cigarettes or cigarette papers so seized shall be disposed of, if seized by a constable, in such manner as the police authority may direct, and if seized by any other person in such manner as the authority or person by whom that person was appointed may direct.”

The utmost a police constable could do would be to save the remnant of a cigarette remaining between the boy's lips. This clause was well fitted to provide comedy for a Christmas pantomime in which the policeman might be chasing a number of small boys round the stage. He would challenge any hon. Member who had carefully read this clause and this proviso to get up and say that it could be enforced. It would be sure to bring the police into ridicule. What could be more ludicrous than the spectacle of police constables or park-keepers chasing small boys all over the park in order to take from them one cigarette? Under this clause the police constable would not be able to search the boys. He hoped the Attorney-General for Ireland would exercise his Irish sense of humour and agree to omit a clause which would make the Bill ridiculous.

MR. FELL said it was perfectly clear from the persistence with which the Government maintained that this clause should remain that Clause 39 would be inoperative. It was quite plain that boys would succeed in obtaining cigarettes whatever clause was passed. Then came the question of the seizure of the cigarettes upon the boys. Searching of the boys was not to be allowed, and they could not see the cigarettes concealed in the boys' pockets. If a constable went so far as to search a boy, that constable would render himself liable to an action. The clause would be absolutely inoperative, because the remains of the cigarette which the boy was smoking would be all that the policeman could possibly secure. With regard to placing these summary powers in the hands of police constables and park-keepers in uniform, he would like to know if the clause included men in uniform standing outside hotels. One of the things they had always prided themselves upon in this country was that “jacks in office” in England had no powers of this kind. In Germany policemen had powers of summarily exacting a small fine from boys in certain circumstances; but he hoped Parliament in this country would set its face against giving bureaucratic men in uniform a power which would be detrimental to society, and furnish a most unfortunate precedent. The clause was really ridiculous. It was absurd to give a policeman power to try to take away the fag-end of a cigarette from a boy without having the power to take from him those cigarettes which he might have in his pockets.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD appealed to those in charge of the measure to allow this clause to be withdrawn. The House was aware of the difficulties in which a clause of this kind would involve park-keepers. Some of the park-keepers were old men who had been gardeners, whose principal duty was to take charge of the grass and perform other light duties in the park. He could picture an elderly, stout park-keeper with half-a-dozen or a dozen boys under sixteen at the comparatively safe distance of nine or ten yards, forming a ring round him, in one of the public parks of Manchester or Liverpool, and exhibiting under his nose about an inch of unconsumed cigarette. It would be the duty of that park-keeper to catch those boys and seize those pieces of cigarettes. If the park-keeper made a dash for one of the lads the scene that would take place would be quite obvious. There would be a chase, and it would be impossible for that park-keeper to catch any of the boys, and the result would be only to make a jeering, stupid exhibition of the park-keeper all over the park. What effect was all this going to have upon the boys? It would make every boy ready to make it a matter of honour and ambition to defy this particular clause. It would be a boy's ambition to smoke, and he would make it his daily habit to carry a piece of cigarette with the object of defying park-keepers and making exhibitions of the kind he had described. The absurdity of the clause could only be realised when they came to consider what the Act provided with regard to the seizing of cigarettes. The clause laid down that—

"Any cigarettes or cigarette-papers so seized shall be disposed of if seized by a constable in such manner as the police authority may direct, and if seized by any other person in such manner as the authority or person by whom that person was appointed may direct."

They would get about a third of one of them, and that was to be disposed of under an Act of Parliament. That was the only really effective part of the clause. There was to be a great distinction drawn if it had been captured by a constable or a park-keeper. They were all anxious to put an end to juvenile smoking, but when they saw a clause drawn in this ridiculous manner and solemnly put forward by the Government as their solution of the evil, he thought it reduced the whole thing to a piece of ludicrous nonsense. How were people under sixteen to get cigarettes at all if Clause 39 was of any use? It seemed to him that the clause was going to have the effect of increasing the difficulties of the park-keepers who had to maintain order in the public parks. The Amendments of which the Under-Secretary had given notice showed the mind of the Government. One was to alter the word "boy" to "person," and the other was to get rid of the right of search. Under the clause as proposed to be amended, constables and park-keepers were to have the right of following up a boy or girl whom they saw holding a piece of cigarette and of resorting to measures which, as he had pointed out, would have ludicrous consequences.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 Frederick Banbury and Mr.
 Watson Rutherford.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 27, to leave out the word 'boy' and to insert the word 'person.'"
 —(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out in page 24, line 33, the word "apparently." As he understood the speech of the Attorney-General for Ireland, the word "apparently" had a different meaning in this clause from what it had in a previous clause.

MR. CHERRY said that what he had stated was that it would have a different effect.

SIR F. BANBURY said that that did not weaken his argument but rather justified him in moving his Amendment. It was not always an easy thing for one to say that a person was, or was not, under the age of sixteen. Let them see for a moment what might happen. A girl of eighteen might be walking down a street with a cigarette in her hand. She might not be smoking it, but suppose a constable said that she was under sixteen, and asked her to give up her cigarette, and that she refused, and that he then took it from her. If an action was brought against the constable or park-keeper for assault under these circumstances, the only defence required would be that the constable or the park-keeper believed her to be under sixteen. Even assuming, for the sake of argument, that the girl was her case, it would cost her a very large amount of money, all owing to the capidity or to the zeal of a constable anxious to get promotion for activity in the prosecution of his duty and carrying out all the powers entrusted to him under this Act. The word "apparently" had evidently been put into the Bill to protect the police constables. If the Amendment were accepted, it would be that the police constables know that he must exercise some reasonable precaution in taking the end of a cigarette out of the mouth of a young person. He hoped the Government would listen to reason and accept his Amendment, which he now begged to move.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) seconded the Amendment mainly in the interest of the unfortunate people who were to be given the duty of carrying out this portion of the Act. The machinery contained in the clause was absolutely absurd and unworkable, and he hoped the Government would modify the clause in the interest of their own Bill.

Amendment proposed—

 —(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he had dealt with this point only a few minutes ago when it had been raised on another clause by the hon. Baronet. If the Amendment were adopted and the word "apparently" left out, the police and the park-keepers would have no defence if they took action against a person who looked of the age of eighteen and was, as a matter of fact, under sixteen. The Amendment would make the clause utterly unworkable.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL hoped that his hon. friend would not press his Amendment. He doubted whether the clause would remain in the Bill, because, if the Amendment which stood in the name of the Under-Secretary, taking

 ed, less if

the clause did remain in the Bill, then he was in favour of retaining the word "apparently," because it would protect the constable or the park-keeper who engaged in a chase to capture the end of a cigarette, in judging the age of the young person.

Amendment negatived,

MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) moved to add at the end of the clause the words: "And if any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or other tobacco are so seized, it shall be reported to the chief officer of police for the district, who shall send a written notice of the fact to the parent or guardian of the person from whom they were seized." He said he ventured to bring forward this Amendment because it was defeated in Committee by a majority of only one vote. When the Bill was in Committee he thought that the Amendment was hardly necessary, because at that time it was provided that in the event of the child smoking or showing disrespect for the police the child was to be summoned and punished in a very drastic manner for smoking. Now the Under-Secretary had undertaken to leave out Clause 41 and therefore made no provision for the punishment of juveniles for smoking in public parks or refusing to obey the police. Therefore, it appeared to him that the Amendment which he proposed was absolutely necessary. If it were not adopted this clause would only encourage smoking, as it would give great opportunity for amusement to small boys and undoubtedly lead them to buy cigarettes for the purpose of chaffing the police. Under the Bill as it now stood he thought boys would learn to smoke simply for the purpose of having the opportunity of a little amusement at the expense of the park-keepers and the police. They wished to avoid that state of affairs which had been depicted by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and it was important that they should get the police backed up by the parents in standing out against smoking. This was one of the most dangerous provisions of the Bill, because it would familiarise the rising generation with the idea that they could break the law with absolute impunity. When they had been all to flaunt the police with regard to smoking, they might think the might be the case in regard to serious offences, and they might not be disposed to restrict the breach of a particular Act of Parliament. He did not like these smoking clauses at all, but he liked them less now that Clause 41 was left out, and he appealed to the Home Secretary to accept this Amendment which would give him an opportunity of mitigating one of the great dangers of the Bill. One of the serious perils was that the Bill was going to be set in force through the influence of the police, the police in industrial schools, which were less efficient agents for the education of the young than the influence of the parent if properly exerted. He thought that the parent should know that the child was smoking so that he could prevent him from going to the park and chaffing the police. He could not see anything would be lost by enlisting the parents on the side of the law and against smoking, and if this Amendment were adopted they might do a great deal to make this provision effective and not make the police the laughing stock of the country. He begged to move.

SIR F. BANBURY had the pleasure of seconding the Amendment of his friend, which he thought was a very useful one. If it were carried it would give the parent the power of exercising proper control over his offspring. He would be able to give him a flogging if it was necessary, the way as they used to get at school if they smoked unless they were in a part of the school. The Bill would have a greater effect, both morally and physically, if this clause were amended in this way. For these reasons he begged to second.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 32, at end, to insert the words 'And if any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or other tobacco are so seized, it shall be reported to the chief officer of police for the district, who shall send a written notice of the fact to the parent or guardian of the

from whom they are seized."—(Mr. Walter Guinness.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL said he wished he could see his way to accept Amendments strengthening this clause when proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but this would involve the same and address of the child in every case being traced. The object of the clause was to stop smoking in the street, and he thought that while it was desirable that the parent should be informed in all cases, he did not think it should be made the statutory duty of the chief officer of police to embark upon these inquiries, and trace out the parent of every child in every case. For these reasons he hoped the hon. Member, although he knew he was earnestly interested in this clause, would not press this Amendment. Of course, it would be optional on the part of the police or the watch committees in any particular town to send information to the parent, but it should not be obligatory upon them to do so.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said the hon. Gentleman had made it perfectly clear that in the Bill as it was to be passed it was optional for the police to give this notice, but if the police did not exercise the option the child might be sent to prison, because he was unable to pay the costs, and the fine imposed upon him.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not think the hon. Member was in the House when it was stated that Clause 41 was to be dropped. There would be no penalties upon the child or parent.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY said that that made it all the more important that the parent should know what the child had done. They should have some intimation given to the parent of what the naughty boy or girl had done. Therefore he earnestly hoped that the Amendment of his hon. friend would be accepted.

Mr. MOORE said that stage of the debate on t

Minister in charge of it said that the whole scheme of these provisions was based on a desire to secure the co-operation of the parents. Here was an earnest Amendment which gave the Government the means of securing their active co-operation, and as soon as it was brought before the House the Minister in charge said he could not accept it. Of course, they could not force his hand upon that, but he thought it was a sinister comment upon the bona fides of his own assertion that the object was to secure the co-operation of the parents.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY thought it was a pity that the Under-Secretary had treated this Amendment so cavalierly, as it was one of the greatest importance. Surely they had arrived at a ridiculous position. They had made it illegal for a tobacconist to sell cigarettes to a child, and made it possible for a police constable to seize cigarettes; but there was absolutely nothing in the Bill making it illegal for the child to smoke tobacco. Therefore the one person they desired to get at was not got at at all by this Bill. Clause 41 might not have been a very reasonable clause, but it was logical, and in it there was a penalty for the child smoking. Now no penalty was provided, and therefore it appeared to him the least the Government could do if they dropped Clause 41 was to provide that a child doing that which was condemned by an Act of Parliament should be punished. The Under-Secretary seemed to have a very sanguine opinion of the character of young persons who would come under this Bill, and thought that the last thing they would do was to try to "rag" the police or the park constable by smoking, and then when the officer came up put the cigarette in their pockets. He seemed to think that the moment this Bill was passed the smoking of cigarettes would be finished, but it seemed to him that that was a very optimistic view to take, and that these sections as they stood would be inoperative, because there was no penalty whatever imposed, either parental or legal, upon the child who practised cigarette-smoking. If this Amendment were accepted the parent

to put an Amendment on the Paper to Clause 41, in which he proposed to inflict a very old penalty, if this was to be a crime at all. The penalty was that of a whipping. Of course, that could not now come in, but he nevertheless thought it would have been more appropriate than fining the unfortunate parent 10s. or sentencing him to a term of imprisonment. But if his penalty could not come in now it would be proper and appropriate at least to give the parent the opportunity of punishing his child.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) did not agree with the noble Lord in thinking that the Bill would be inoperative; he thought that it would afford a direct encouragement to children to smoke. Most boys of a tender age who might be seen smoking in public places did so, not because of any attachment to tobacco, but because they considered it a practice in advance of their years, and something moreover which their elders told them not to do, affording them, therefore, the added pleasure of disobedience which was so dear to boys of their age. Under the Bill, cigarette-smoking would have for boys even a greater attraction than before, because the boys would now be actually breaking the law. The Legislature had now given a zest to juvenile smoking which it hitherto not possessed in the juvenile mind. Not only could a boy do a grown-up thing, of which his parents possibly disapproved, but he was now even to be reported to his parents so that he was given a whole afternoon's amusement at the expense of the constable or park-keeper. He would get hold of two or three cigarettes, walk along with one in his mouth, dance in front of the park-keeper, and when the park-keeper had caught him the boy would put a cigarette in his pocket. The right of smoking having been taken away the matter came to an end until the youth again put his cigarette into his mouth and amusement would begin all over again. He, therefore, had the pleasure of breaking the law, of doing what his parents would not like him to do, of annoying the park-keeper, and thus he obtained an afternoon's amusement—and all at the instigation of a paternal Government which was too anxious to do him good.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL moved the search any person under sixteen found the fact that the Amendment lessened the effectiveness of Clause 40. But he moved it in accordance with a pledge given in Committee. During the discussions in Committee, not only the opponents, but the supporters of this measure, urged upon him that the police should not be given a right to search a child or young person found smoking in a public place. They considered that it was an indignity to which they should not be subjected. That being so, he undertook to put down some Amendment on the lines on which he now moved. He complained that hon. Gentlemen opposite had not treated him quite fairly with reference to this clause. After having honestly attempted to meet their wishes, he had merely been met by the accusation that he had made the clause weak and ineffective.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 32, at end to insert the words 'Provided that such constable, park-keeper or other person as aforesaid shall not be authorised to search any person so found smoking.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said it would puzzle anybody to know what the general principle of the clause was. They had done away with the penalty and with the right of search. What was there left? A policeman was ordered to seize any cigarettes in the possession of these children, but he would only be able to seize the cigarette in the child's mouth. He would not be able to tell whether or not the child had any more because he would not be allowed to search. The whole proceeding was absurd, and he could not help feeling that hon. Members opposite, who had been so silent, and had not uttered any defence of the clause, would agree that the clause was full of absurdities.

MR. H. J. TENNANT (Berwickshire): That is not so.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: But they have not said they support the clause.

MR. H. J. TENNANT: No, in order to save the time of the House.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said that was a very old story. The clause would create a new trade. He wished he had such an opportunity when he was a lad which this clause would give. Boys under sixteen would say to their pals who were seventeen: "You go and buy us some cigarettes, and we will give you one for your commission." Lads would not have the slightest difficulty in getting cigarettes. It was absurd to think such a thing. Would any hon. Member say there would be any difficulty? Their silence answered the question. There was the incentive in every direction not only to have fun which was to be got without risk of any penalty, but also to get cigarettes in a co-operative manner. A boy of sixteen and-a-half years would only be too glad to earn commission by getting a large number of cigarettes. The clause would be not only inoperative but ridiculous and mischievous, it would tend to increase the very thing which it was no doubt wished to decrease. One might ask the Under-Secretary whether he would not consider dropping of the clause instead of allowing it to become a laughing stock.

MR. MOORE wished to call attention to the regret which the Minister in charge of the Bill had expressed for the position in which he found himself in being obliged to move an Amendment that a constable, park-keeper, or other person should not be authorised to search a person found smoking in the street or a public place. He felt regret that he was obliged to bring in an Amendment which would prevent a policeman in a public place searching a young girl.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The hon. Member will excuse me. That is not so at all. I distinctly said that "boy" was changed back to "person" in view of the fact that this Amendment with regard to search was to be inserted.

MR. MOORE said that without qualification whatever the Minister in charge of the Bill had expressed regret that he had to move the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

definition clause as a person who was not more than sixteen, and the protection which was accorded to the tobacconist was withdrawn in the case of sale by automatic machines. The question of proof was very difficult in the case of automatic machines, but the penalty was fixed. There was no question of reasonable belief, the purchaser could not be examined, there was no question of bona-fides, and that involved a very great hardship on the person who was responsible for the machine. The House would be well advised in protecting traders against injustice, by omitting the clause altogether.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out, to the word ‘is,’ in page 24, line 3, stand part of the Bill.”

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he was sure that if they had not included in this part of the Bill a clause dealing with the sale of cigarettes by automatic machines, hon. Gentlemen opposite would have said it was a monstrous injustice to tobacconists. They would have said: “You are prohibiting tobacconists from selling cigarettes, but you are doing nothing to protect them from the competition of automatic machines which may be set up for the very purpose of selling cigarettes to children.” He admitted that the method of dealing with the question was not free from difficulty. It was not possible, of course, to propose to abolish altogether automatic machines for the sale of cigarettes. That would cause great inconvenience. Nor was there need to do so, because cigarettes in automatic machines, as yet, were mainly of a more expensive kind, and were not largely bought by children. But things might be altered, and after the passage of this part of the Bill, automatic machines might take up this particular trade, besides which automatic machines were sometimes put up in places where children specially congregated, like what were called “Wonderlands,” brightly-lighted places where children could go in and see mutoscopes and other attractions. It was quite a reasonable proposal that where it could be proved on evidence that automatic machines were being extensively used by children and young persons, the proprietor must take precautions by placing an attendant to see that they were not being used, or else that the machines should be moved to some other place where they would not be so extensively used. It had been pointed out that the penalties in the clause were different and more severe than those laid upon tobacconists, but the offence was a very different one. The owner of the automatic machines was not penalised in this case for selling to children, but for disobeying the order of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction. An order once made by the Court must be properly enforced, and the penalty must be sufficient to achieve the object. He should be happy to accept the noble Lord’s proposal to allow an appeal against the decision of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction to Quarter Sessions, which would, to some extent, meet the objection of the hon. Baroness. He had received no representations from the companies owning these machines that they had any objection whatever to the clause. They did not complain of its provisions or ask for an amendment. The Standing Committee, after giving the clause full consideration, had passed it without a division. He hoped the House would retain it.

MR. WALTER LONG said he was the last person in the world to be likely to complain of a Minister who, at the end of a weary sitting, got a little sore with his opponents, and recognised the great ability and firmness and courtesy with which the hon. Gentleman had conducted the Bill.

but he would permit him in perfect frankness and friendliness to suggest that if he wanted to get his Bill through he had better not accuse the Opposition of unfairness. This was one of those Bills which they could really only pass with the consent of the Opposition. He knew that that was a very disagreeable position for the majority, when it was as big and as impatient as the present one, to have to face, but it was a fact. This was a Bill with an enormous number of clauses, and he could not help thinking that the Under-Secretary, if he had no better grounds on which to base this clause than those he had presented to them, would have done well to drop it. If that were the Palace of Truth, and the Under-Secretary told them what was in the back of his mind, he thought he would admit now that he was very sorry he had not dropped four or five clauses a long time ago, because he would have been saved a weary debate, and the Bill would have been to all intents and purposes for the protection of the children of the country an even better Bill than it would be with those numerous clauses in it. Clauses of this kind would not be used in the admirable manner in which the Under-Secretary suggested, merely to deal with the case where there might be shows in which were placed machines used exclusively by children. What was the cause of half the controversy and the debate which was going on in the country? It was the bitterness and the extreme character of the competition which made living by traders of all kinds almost impossible. That was what was driving men to look into these matters for themselves and see whether they could not find some new remedy. What was legislation of this kind going to do? In order to provide against the case of some show where children might be using these machines to get cigarettes they were going to give to magistrates a power which might, without any charge of injustice, be used with very considerable unfairness towards traders in various parts of the country. The Under-Secretary said he had received no representations. He had been responsible for many Bills which had affected traders of all kinds, and nobody knew better than a Minister who had had charge of a Bill how frequently it happened that clause after clause was put into a Bill and went through the House, and it was not until, through the medium of the police and the consequent interference with the liberty of the subject, the effect was appreciated and the individual realised what was the interference with his trade. The fact that the Under-Secretary had received no representations from the traders connected with these machines was no evidence whatever as to the working of these clauses and afforded no reason at all why they should give their assent to what they believed to be an unnecessary and vexatious proposal. This group of clauses was put in to prevent children smoking—an admirable thing. He doubted whether the figures given by the Home Secretary, for which he produced neither chapter nor verse, could be sustained. For the first time he had heard the suggestions made as to the effects of smoking. They were not figures which had ever yet been accepted by the House of Commons as a guide to legislation, and they ought never to have been given. While he did not accept the statement of the case as presented by the Government, they all agreed that smoking by children of tender years was an abominable thing which ought to be stopped. How were they going to stop it? By a series of clauses which proposed to harass an industry and interfere with individual liberty, and transfer the responsibility of the parent to the police, the park-keeper, and the trader. That was ridiculous legislation. The Under-Secretary told them they were unreasonable. They were not unreasonable. It did not at all follow that, because they objected to the clause in its original form, they

Frederick Banbury and Mr.
Watson Rutherford.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 27, to leave out the word 'boy' and to insert the word 'person.'"—
(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out in page 24, line 33, the word "apparently." As he understood the speech of the Attorney-General for Ireland, the word "apparently" had a different meaning in this clause from what it had in a previous clause.

MR. CHERRY said that what he had stated was that it would have a different effect.

SIR F. BANBURY said that that did not weaken his argument but rather justified him in moving his Amendment. It was not always an easy thing for one to say that a person was, or was not, under the age of sixteen. Let them see for a moment what might happen. A girl of eighteen might be walking down a street with a cigarette in her hand. She might not be smoking it, but suppose a constable said that she was under sixteen, and asked her to give up her cigarette, and that she refused, and that he then took it from her. If an action was brought against the constable or park-keeper for assault under these circumstances, the only defence required would be that the constable or the park-keeper believed her to be under sixteen. Even assuming, for the sake of argument, that the girl won her case, it would cost her a very large amount of money, all owing to the stupidity or to the zeal of a constable anxious to get promotion for activity in the prosecution of his duty and carrying out all the powers entrusted to him under this Act. The word "apparently" had evidently been put into the clause to protect the police constable. If his Amendment were accepted, the result would be that the police constable would know that he must exercise some reasonable precaution in taking the end of a cigarette out of the mouth of a young person. He hoped the Government would listen to reason and accept his Amendment, which he now begged to move.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) seconded the Amendment mainly in the interest of the unfortunate people who were to be given the duty of carrying out this portion of the Act. The machinery contained in the clause was absolutely absurd and unworkable, and he hoped the Government would modify the clause in the interest of their own Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 33, to leave out the word 'apparently.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he had dealt with this point only a few minutes ago when it had been raised on another clause by the hon. Baronet. If the Amendment were adopted and the word "apparently" left out, the police and the park-keepers would have no defence if they took action against a person who looked of the age of eighteen and was, as a matter of fact, under sixteen. The Amendment would make the clause utterly unworkable.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL hoped that his hon. friend would not press his Amendment. He doubted whether the clause would remain in the Bill, because, if the Amendment which stood in the name of the Under-Secretary, taking away from the police and the park-keepers the right of search, were passed, it would reduce the clause to a hopeless and ludicrous absurdity. However, if

Frederick Banbury and Mr.
Watson Rutherford.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 27, to leave out the word 'boy' and to insert the word 'person.'"—
(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved to leave out in page 24, line 33, the word "apparently." As he understood the speech of the Attorney-General for Ireland, the word "apparently" had a different meaning in this clause from what it had in a previous clause.

MR. CHERRY said that what he had stated was that it would have a different effect.

SIR F. BANBURY said that that did not weaken his argument but rather justified him in moving his Amendment. It was not always an easy thing for one to say that a person was, or was not, under the age of sixteen. Let them see for a moment what might happen. A girl of eighteen might be walking down a street with a cigarette in her hand. She might not be smoking it, but suppose a constable said that she was under sixteen, and asked her to give up her cigarette, and that she refused, and that he then took it from her. If an action was brought against the constable or park-keeper for assault under these circumstances, the only defence required would be that the constable or the park-keeper believed her to be under sixteen. Even assuming, for the sake of argument, that the girl won her case, it would cost her a very large amount of money, all owing to the stupidity or to the zeal of a constable anxious to get promotion for activity in the prosecution of his duty and carrying out all the powers entrusted to him under this Act. The word "apparently" had evidently been put into the clause to protect the police constable. If his Amendment were accepted, the result would be that the police constable would know that he must exercise some reasonable precaution in taking the end of a cigarette out of the mouth of a young person. He hoped the Government would listen to reason and accept his Amendment, which he now begged to move.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) seconded the Amendment mainly in the interest of the unfortunate people who were to be given the duty of carrying out this portion of the Act. The machinery contained in the clause was absolutely absurd and unworkable, and he hoped the Government would modify the clause in the interest of their own Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 33, to leave out the word 'apparently.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he had dealt with this point only a few minutes ago when it had been raised on another clause by the hon. Baronet. If the Amendment were adopted and the word "apparently" left out, the police and the park-keepers would have no defence if they took action against a person who looked of the age of eighteen and was, as a matter of fact, under sixteen. The Amendment would make the clause utterly unworkable.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL hoped that his hon. friend would not press his Amendment. He doubted whether the clause would remain in the Bill, because, if the Amendment which stood in the name of the Under-Secretary, taking away from the police and the park-keepers the right of search, were passed, it would reduce the clause to a hopeless and ludicrous absurdity. However, if

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he wished he could see his way to accept Amendments strengthening this clause when proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but this would involve the name and address of the child in every case being traced. The object of the clause was to stop smoking in the street, and he thought that while it was desirable that the parent should be informed in all cases, he did not think it should be made the statutory duty of the chief officer of police to embark upon these inquiries, and trace out the parent of every child in every case. For these reasons he hoped the hon. Member, although he knew he was earnestly interested in this clause, would not press this Amendment. Of course, it would be optional on the part of the police or the watch committees in any particular town to send information to the parent, but it should not be obligatory upon them to do so.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said the hon. Gentleman had made it perfectly clear that in the Bill as it was to be passed it was optional for the police to give this notice, but if the police did not exercise the option the child might be sent to prison, because he was unable to pay the costs, and the fine imposed upon him.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not think the hon. Member was in the House when it was stated that Clause 41 was to be dropped. There would be no penalties upon the child or parent.

MR. CLAUDE HAY said that that made it all the more important that the parent should know what the child had done. They should have some intimation given to the parent of what the naughty boy or girl had done. Therefore he earnestly hoped that the Amendment of his hon. friend would be accepted.

MR. MOORE said that at an earlier stage of the debate on this clause the Minister in charge of it said that the whole scheme of these provisions was based on a desire to secure the co-operation of the parents. Here was an earnest Amendment which gave the Government the means of securing their active co-operation, and as soon as it was brought before the House the Minister in charge said he could not accept it. Of course, they could not force his hand upon that, but he thought it was a sinister comment upon the bona fides of his own assertion that the object was to secure the co-operation of the parents.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY thought it was a pity that the Under-Secretary had treated this Amendment so cavalierly, as it was one of the greatest importance. Surely they had arrived at a ridiculous position. They had made it illegal for a tobacconist to sell cigarettes to a child, and made it possible for a police constable to seize cigarettes; but there was absolutely nothing in the Bill making it illegal for the child to smoke tobacco. Therefore the one person they desired to get at was not got at at all by this Bill. Clause 41 might not have been a very reasonable clause, but it was logical, and in it there was a penalty for the child smoking. Now no penalty was provided, and therefore it appeared to him the least the Government could do if they dropped Clause 41 was to provide that a child doing that which was condemned by an Act of Parliament should be punished. The Under-Secretary seemed to have a very sanguine opinion of the character of young persons who would come under this Bill, and thought that the last thing they would do was to try to "rag" the police or the park constable by smoking, and then when the officer came up put the cigarette in their pockets. He seemed to think that the moment this Bill was passed the smoking of cigarettes would be finished, but it seemed to him that that was a very optimistic view to take, and that these sections as they stood would be inoperative, because there was no penalty whatever imposed, either parental or legal, upon the child who practised cigarette-smoking. If this Amendment were accepted the parent would be given an opportunity of punishing the child, and so be enabled to act with the State. He had himself ventured the clause did remain in the Bill, then he was in favour of retaining the word "apparently," because it would protect the constable or the park-keeper who engaged in a chase to capture the end of a cigarette, in judging the age of the young person.

Amendment negatived,

MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) moved to add at the end of the clause the words: "And if any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or other tobacco are so seized, it shall be reported to the chief officer of police for the district, who shall send a written notice of the fact to the parent or guardian of the person from whom they were seized." He said he ventured to bring forward this Amendment because it was defeated in Committee by a majority of only one vote. When the Bill was in Committee he thought that the Amendment was hardly necessary, because at that time it was provided that in the event of the child smoking or showing disrespect for the police the child was to be summoned and punished in a very drastic manner for smoking. Now the Under-Secretary had undertaken to leave out Clause 41 and therefore made no provision for the punishment of juveniles for smoking in public parks or refusing to obey the police. Therefore, it appeared to him that the Amendment which he proposed was absolutely necessary. If it were not adopted this clause would only encourage smoking, as it would give great opportunity for amusement to small boys and undoubtedly lead them to buy cigarettes for the purpose of chaffing the police. Under the Bill as it now stood he thought boys would learn to smoke simply for the purpose of having the opportunity of a little amusement at the expense of the park-keepers and the police. They wished to avoid that state of affairs which had been depicted by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and it was important that they should get the police backed up by the parents in standing out against smoking. This was one of the most dangerous provisions of the Bill, because it would familiarise the rising generation with the idea that they could break the law with absolute impunity. When they had been allowed to flaunt the police with regard to smoking, they might think the same might be the case in regard to more serious offences, and they might not be disposed to restrict the breach to a particular Act of Parliament. He did not like these smoking clauses at all, but he liked them less now that Clause 41 was left out, and he appealed to the Home Secretary to accept this Amendment which would give him an opportunity of mitigating one of the greatest dangers of the Bill. One of the most serious perils was that the Bill was going to be set in force through the influence of the police, the police court and industrial schools, which were far less efficient agents for the education of the young than the influence of the parent if properly exerted. He thought that the parent should know that his child was smoking so that he might prevent him from going to the park and chaffing the police. He could not see that anything would be lost by enlisting the parents on the side of the police and against smoking, and if this Amendment were adopted they might do a great deal to make this provision effective, and not make the police the laughing-stock of the country. He begged to move.

SIR F. BANBURY had pleasure in seconding the Amendment of his hon. friend, which he thought was a very useful one. If it were carried it would give the parent the power of exercising proper control over his offspring, and he would be able to give him a good flogging if it was necessary, the same as they used to get at school if they smoked unless they were in a certain part of the school. The Bill would have a greater effect, both morally and physically, if this clause were amended in this way. For these reasons he begged to second.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 32, at end, to insert the words 'And if any cigarettes, cigarette papers, or other tobacco are so seized, it shall be reported to the chief officer of police for the district, who shall send a written notice of the fact to the parent or guardian of the person

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Master of Elibank and Mr.
 Herbert Lewis.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL moved the proviso that a constable, park-keeper, or other person shall not be authorised to search any person under sixteen found smoking. He said he did so with some reluctance, because he could not conceal to put an Amendment on the Paper to Clause 41, in which he proposed to inflict a very old penalty, if this was to be a crime at all. The penalty was that of a whipping. Of course, that could not now come in, but he nevertheless thought it would have been more appropriate than fining the unfortunate parent 10s. or sentencing him to a term of imprisonment. But if his penalty could not come in now it would be proper and appropriate at least to give the parent the opportunity of punishing his child.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) did not agree with the noble Lord in thinking that the Bill would be inoperative; he thought that it would afford a direct encouragement to children to smoke. Most boys of a tender age who might be seen smoking in public places did so, not because of any attachment to tobacco, but because they considered it a practice in advance of their years, and something moreover which their elders told them not to do, affording them, therefore, the added pleasure of disobedience which was so dear to boys of their age. Under the Bill, cigarette-smoking would have for boys even a greater attraction than before, because the boys would now be actually breaking the law. The Legislature had now given a zest to juvenile smoking which it had hitherto not possessed in the juvenile mind. Not only could a boy do this grown-up thing, of which his parents possibly disapproved, but he was now even to be reported to his parent, so that he was given a whole afternoon's amusement at the expense of the constable or park-keeper. He would get hold of two or three cigarettes, walk along with one in his mouth, dance in front of the park-keeper, and when the park-keeper had caught him the boy would put his cigarette in his pocket. The right of search having been taken away the matter there came to an end until the youth again put his cigarette into his mouth and the amusement would begin all over again. He, therefore, had the pleasure of breaking the law, of doing what his parent would not like him to do, of annoying the park-keeper, and thus he obtained an afternoon's amusement—and all at the instance of a paternal Government which was only too anxious to do him good.

Amendment proposed—

"That Clause 41 be omitted."—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved the omission of Clause 42 (Provisions as to automatic machines for the sale of tobacco). They all knew that automatic machines were put in various places, particularly railway-stations and exhibitions, for the sale of various commodities, and that the owners had to pay rent for the ground on which they stood as well as considerable sums for the machines themselves. All that money was to be wasted because forsooth some person under sixteen might occasionally put in a penny and take out a cigarette. How did the Under-Secretary propose to find out whether any young person was in the habit of going to one of the machines, putting a penny in, and taking out a cigarette? Did he propose to get policemen, park-keepers, or persons in uniform to watch every one of the machines? Unless he did so, how did he intend to find out that a machine was being extensively used by children or young persons for the purpose of obtaining cigarettes? Of course, it was absolutely certain he was not going to do anything of the sort. Human nature was not going to be altered by this or any other Bill, and there would be nothing to prevent a rival trader who wanted the site going to a policeman and, out of spite, saying that he had seen a boy apparently under sixteen on several occasions put a penny in a machine and take out a cigarette. The police naturally would be bound to summon the owner for allowing his machine to be used by young persons for the purpose of obtaining cigarettes, and the Court would be able to order that such precautions should be taken as would prevent the machine being so used. The only possible precaution would be to place a responsible person by the machine to see that young persons did not put pennies in the slot and obtain cigarettes. The very object of the machines, however, was to do away with the necessity of having attendants. That object would be defeated merely because occasionally some young person might obtain a cigarette from a machine. A station was a public place in which there was often a policeman, and at an exhibition there would be a person in uniform. If they saw a boy put a penny in an automatic machine and take out a cigarette, they would be able to take it away from him providing he smoked it, and he would have thought that was a good precaution and sufficient for the purpose of the Bill. There was a heavy fine to be inflicted upon the unfortunate person who failed to comply with a magistrate's order, and take precautions to see that his machine was not used by juveniles to obtain cigarettes. He was to be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 on summary conviction, and to a further fine not exceeding £1 for every day during which the offence continued. That seemed to him a monstrous punishment for a very small offence, if it was an offence at all. If he did not pay the fine, he was liable to go to prison. The Under-Secretary might say that if it were not for this clause every boy would get cigarettes out of automatic machines, and so evade the provisions of the Bill. Was it really likely they would do so; but even if they did the end of the world would not come because the provisions of the Bill were not carried out, whereas a considerable amount of inconvenience and injustice would be inflicted if they were.

MR. MOORE said the provisions of this clause were slightly different, and unfairly different, in comparison with those they had already considered. The tobacconist was protected from any charges involving an offence under the Act where he sold his commodities to a person who was apparently not under the age of sixteen. A young person was defined in the

the fact that the Amendment lessened the effectiveness of Clause 40. But he moved it in accordance with a pledge given in Committee. During the discussions in Committee, not only the opponents, but the supporters of this measure, urged upon him that the police should not be given a right to search a child or young person found smoking in a public place. They considered that it was an indignity to which they should not be subjected. That being so, he undertook to put down some Amendment on the lines on which he now moved. He complained that hon. Gentlemen opposite had not treated him quite fairly with reference to this clause. After having honestly attempted to meet their wishes, he had merely been met by the accusation that he had made the clause weak and ineffective.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 23, line 32, at end to insert the words 'Provided that such constable, park-keeper or other person as aforesaid shall not be authorised to search any person so found smoking.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said it would puzzle anybody to know what the general principle of the clause was. They had done away with the penalty and with the right of search. What was there left? A policeman was ordered to seize any cigarettes in the possession of these children, but he would only be able to seize the cigarette in the child's mouth. He would not be able to tell whether or not the child had any more because he would not be allowed to search. The whole proceeding was absurd, and he could not help feeling that hon. Members opposite, who had been so silent, and had not uttered any defence of the clause, would agree that the clause was full of absurdities.

MR. H. J. TENNANT (Berwickshire): That is not so.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: But they have not said they support the clause.

MR. H. J. TENNANT: No, in order to save the time of the House.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said that that was a very old story. The clause would create a new trade. He wished he had had such an opportunity when he was a lad which this clause would give. Boys under sixteen would say to their pals who were seventeen: "You just go and buy us some cigarettes, and we will give you one for your commission." Lads would not have the slightest difficulty in getting cigarettes. It was absurd to think such a thing. Would any hon. Member say there would be any difficulty? Their silence answered the question. There was the incentive in every direction not only to have the fun which was to be got without risk of any penalty, but also to get cigarettes in a co-operative manner. A boy of sixteen and-a-half years would only be too glad to earn commission by getting any number of cigarettes. The whole clause would be not only inoperative, but ridiculous and mischievous, and it would tend to increase the very evil which it was no doubt wished to decrease. One might ask the Under-Secretary whether he would not consider the dropping of the clause instead of allowing it to become a laughing stock.

MR. MOORE wished to call attention to the regret which the Minister in charge of the Bill had expressed for the position in which he found himself in being obliged to move an Amendment that a constable, park-keeper, or other person should not be authorised to search a person found smoking in the street or a public place. He felt regret that he was obliged to bring in an Amendment which would prevent a policeman in a public place searching a young girl.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The hon. Member will excuse me. That is not so at all. I distinctly said that the "boy" was changed back to "person" in view of the fact that this Amendment with regard to search was to be inserted.

MR. MOORE said that without any qualification whatever the Minister in charge of the Bill had expressed his regret that he had to move the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

but he would permit him in perfect frankness and friendliness to suggest that if he wanted to get his Bill through he had better not accuse the Opposition of unfairness. This was one of those Bills which they could really only pass with the consent of the Opposition. He knew that that was a very disagreeable position for the majority, when it was as big and as impatient as the present one, to have to face, but it was a fact. This was a Bill with an enormous number of clauses, and he could not help thinking that the Under-Secretary, if he had no better grounds on which to base this clause than those he had presented to them, would have done well to drop it. If that were the Palace of Truth, and the Under-Secretary told them what was in the back of his mind, he thought he would admit now that he was very sorry he had not dropped four or five clauses a long time ago, because he would have been saved a weary debate, and the Bill would have been to all intents and purposes for the protection of the children of the country an even better Bill than it would be with those numerous clauses in it. Clauses of this kind would not be used in the admirable manner in which the Under-Secretary suggested, merely to deal with the case where there might be shows in which were placed machines used exclusively by children. What was the cause of half the controversy and the debate which was going on in the country? It was the bitterness and the extreme character of the competition which made living by traders of all kinds almost impossible. That was what was driving men to look into these matters for themselves and see whether they could not find some new remedy. What was legislation of this kind going to do? In order to provide against the case of some show where children might be using these machines to get cigarettes they were going to give to magistrates a power which might, without any charge of injustice, be used with very considerable unfairness towards traders in various parts of the country. The Under-Secretary said he had received no representations. He had been responsible for many Bills which had affected traders of all kinds, and nobody knew better than a Minister who had had charge of a Bill how frequently it happened that clause after clause was put into a Bill and went through the House, and it was not until, through the medium of the police and the consequent interference with the liberty of the subject, the effect was appreciated and the individual realised what was the interference with his trade. The fact that the Under-Secretary had received no representations from the traders connected with these machines was no evidence whatever as to the working of these clauses and afforded no reason at all why they should give their assent to what they believed to be an unnecessary and vexatious proposal. This group of clauses was put in to prevent children smoking—an admirable thing. He doubted whether the figures given by the Home Secretary, for which he produced neither chapter nor verse, could be sustained. For the first time he had heard the suggestions made as to the effects of smoking. They were not figures which had ever yet been accepted by the House of Commons as a guide to legislation, and they ought never to have been given. While he did not accept the statement of the case as presented by the Government, they all agreed that smoking by children of tender years was an abominable thing which ought to be stopped. How were they going to stop it? By a series of clauses which proposed to harass an industry and interfere with individual liberty, and transfer the responsibility of the parent to the police, the park-keeper, and the trader. That was ridiculous legislation. The Under-Secretary told them they were unreasonable. They were not unreasonable. It did not at all follow that, because they objected to the clause in its original form, they were unreasonable if they objected to the Amendments which the Government themselves proposed to make. It did not follow that their Amendments made the clause a bit more palatable to them than it was in its original form. They objected to the clause on principles which they had always held, and it was to him very remarkable that in dealing with a clause like this, which was to enable these automatic machines to be practically got rid of in certain places, they had really to defend the interests of the poorest and weakest kind of trader in the country. These machines were not the property of large traders, and they were not held in great quantities by one firm, except in a limited number of cases. When the Under-Secretary said that if he had not put these provisions in the Bill they would have upbraided him for allowing cigarettes to be sold by somebody other than the trader, he was entirely wrong. They were not affected by any feelings of that kind. They did not want adversely to criticise the Bill, but the Government could not ask them to pass by provisions of this kind and adopt them in a few minutes, on finding they had been put into a Bill with which they had really no connection whatever. He did not regret the time which had been spent upon the Bill, because, apart altogether from the effect it would have on the legislation they were passing, it would show the House of Commons for the first time that if they were going to rely upon the Standing Committee system they must use these Committees for the purpose for which they were set up, namely, for non-controversial legislation which did not raise great issues or give rise to considerable debate. If they tried to create new offences and to extend the powers exercised by the magistrates and police, they ought to do it in legislation which went through the full regular forms of the House. He hoped that the debates on these clauses would give the country some indication of the extraordinary tendency that legislation was now assuming, and that they would throw a fresh light on the way in which attempts were being made to get legislation through the House by means of Standing Committees without a proper opportunity being given either to the country to understand it or to the House to debate it. For those reasons he most cordially supported the Amendment of his hon. friend, and he ventured to assert that the action of the Opposition in opposing this group of clauses had been thoroughly justified. If the Government had taken their advice, and allowed those objectionable proposals to be eliminated from the Bill, their legislation would have been much better; but as they had refused to do this, the responsibility must rest upon the Government. The clauses to which he referred were quite unnecessary and in no way connected with this Bill—in fact their only effect would be to weaken instead of strengthen the measure. Those were the reasons which had justified the Opposition in the line of action they had adopted, and there was nothing unreasonable in the course they had pursued. He believed that this kind of legislation was thoroughly bad and was establishing a new and dangerous precedent.

 TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir Frederick Banbury and
 Mr. Moore.

LORD R. CECIL moved to insert after "premises" the words "to which the public have access," his object being to confine the operation of the clause to those premises which were public places. It was not quite clear against whom the complaint was to be made. The order might be made upon the owner of the machine or upon the persons on whose premises the machine was kept. He did not know whether the Home Secretary contemplated as the criminal the owner of the machines or the owner of the premises. It seemed to him to be rather a strong order to say that the owner should be compelled to take measures to prevent his machines being used in this way when standing on premises which in ninety-nine cases out of 100 did not belong to him at all. The Amendment, he submitted, would confine the operation of this clause to premises which were public places, and an important category which would be excluded would be railway stations. The owner of a machine might establish and build up a perfectly legitimate and regular trade in cigarettes to grown-up people at a particular place, and children might come along and take advantage of his machines, not for the purpose intended but to gratify their desire to obtain cigarettes, and in this way a very valuable trade belonging to the owner of the machines might be destroyed. He could not think that the Under-Secretary would desire in that case to penalise the owner as heavily as would be the case under this clause. He thought it would be better to confine the operation of this clause to those positions to which children would have access, and leave railway platforms outside the operation of this clause. The Under-Secretary said upon the previous Amendment that if he had not made provision for dealing with automatic machines the Opposition would have complained about unfair competition, and probably that would have been the case. He thought some such proposal as that contained in his Amendment was required if justice was to be done—

And, it being Eleven of the clock, further consideration of the Bill, as amended, stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be further considered To-morrow.

Whereupon MR. SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order of the House of 31st July, adjourned the House, without Question put.

Copy presented,—of Treasury Minute, dated 16th September, 1908, granting a Retired Allowance to Mr. H. S. Ball, Telegraph Engineer, Second Class, Post Office, under Section 2 of the Act [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

SUPERANNUATION ACT, 1887.

Copy presented,—of Treasury Minute, dated 2nd October, 1908, granting a Retired Allowance to Mr. W. D. Ballantyne, Sorting Clerk and Telegraphist, Edinburgh Post Office, under Section 2 of the Act [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

PUBLIC REVENUE (INTERCEPTION).

Return ordered, "of the amounts of all Public Revenue derived from taxes levied by Parliament, and from any other sources, which are not paid into His Majesty's Exchequer, for the years 1905-6, 1906-7, 1907-8, and 1908-9 (estimated), with the totals in each case (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No 334, of session 1906)."—(Mr. Bowles.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Payment of Naval and Military Pensions Weekly through the Post Office.

MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether arrangements can be made for payment next year of Army and Navy pensions by weekly instalments through the Post Office, in the same way as contemplated for old-age pensions.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) As I informed the hon. Member for North Salford on the 25th February last, arrangements have been made for monthly or weekly payment of Army pensions through boards of guardians or otherwise in individual cases where the pensioners so desire or when the pensioner is of such a character as to make this course desirable. But as pensions are paid quarterly in advance, to introduce universal weekly payments would not in the majority of cases be in the interests of the pensioners. The question of making weekly payments through the Post Office will be considered when the arrangements for the payment of old-age pensions are in working order.

London Traffic Problems.

MR. CARR - GOMM (Southwark, Rotherhithe): To ask the Prime Minister whether the Government will be able to deal with the question of London traffic during the coming winter; whether the special branch of the Board of Trade has presented its Report on this matter; and whether the Government will set apart a grant for widening the London streets and improving the means of communication in connection with its proposals for the relief of unemployment in London.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) I understand that the London Traffic Branch of the Board of Trade has presented its Report to the Board, and that it will shortly be laid upon the Table of the House. I cannot hold out any hope that legislation dealing with London traffic can be enacted during the present session.

Transfer of National Telephone Company.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been drawn to the statements made by the Staff Transfer Association on behalf of the staff of the National Telephone Company, to the effect that about 6,000 men, representing the construction staff of the company, will have to be dismissed prior to the transfer of the company's plant to the Post Office on the 31st December, 1911, and that such dismissals will be caused by works not being undertaken which appear to be necessary and desirable in the interests of the telephone service and the public; and whether the Postmaster-General will take immediate steps to see that some arrangement is come to by which the development of the telephone service can proceed uninterruptedly throughout the United Kingdom on efficient lines, so as to avoid inconvenience to the public, and the unnecessary dismissal of qualified men whose services will hereafter be required by the Post Office, and so as to provide remunerative work, if possible, for some of the men and women at present unemployed.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The matter to which the hon. Member refers has been, and is, engaging my careful attention, and I am in communication with the National Telephone Company on the subject. I may add that I believe that many of the statements which have been made, in the Press and elsewhere, on this subject are incorrect or exaggerated.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Admiralty Granite Contracts.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what contracts have been given by the Admiralty during the last six months to British contractors for granite; what amount of money they represent individually; and what total value in annual wages is likely to accrue to the British workman.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The only direct contracts for granite let during the last six months have been for British granite setts for paving, and amount to £250. In the case of large works contracts, the granite is ordered by the contractor and not by the Admiralty; but it is understood that the cost of the granite to be used in the construction of the Portsmouth Lock, the only big work for which the contract has been recently let, is about £55,000, and in this case the stone will be British. The Admiralty have no exact knowledge of the proportions of these sums which will be spent in wages.

Royal Naval Reserve.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can now say whether the Government has decided to grant officers and men of the Royal Naval Reserve a long-service and good-conduct medal.

MR. MCKENNA: It has been decided to institute a decoration for officers of the Royal Naval Reserve and of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, and a long-service and good-conduct medal for men of the Royal Naval Reserve and members of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve.

Admiralty Pensioners.

MR. GODFREY BARING (Isle of Wight): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that several boards of guardians have passed resolutions requesting the Admiralty to arrange for the weekly payment of naval pensions; and whether he can hold out any hope that these requests will be complied with in the near future.

MR. MCKENNA: I am aware that such resolutions have been passed, and I have been giving them the fullest consideration. After weighing most carefully the relative merits of the present system of payment of pensions and that proposed by the boards of guardians, we have come to the conclusion that the balance of advantage lies, on the whole, with the present system, and there does not appear to be sufficient ground for departing from the existing arrangements under which naval pensioners receive payment quarterly in advance.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this matter has been pressed upon his predecessors by several bodies?

MR. MCKENNA: Yes, Sir. I am aware resolutions have been passed by several bodies, but I have come to the conclusion that the balance of advantage lies on the whole with the present system. There does not appear sufficient ground therefore for departing from the present arrangement by which the naval pensioners receive payment quarterly in advance.

SIR FRANCIS CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could give the number of boards of guardians who had sent up resolutions, and whether they had not based the resolutions on the scenes of drunkenness and disorder which arose.

MR. MCKENNA: I cannot say offhand. I am under the impression that boards of guardians have not made any definite inquiry as to the number of cases of thriftlessness among naval pensioners. The Admiralty have inquired, and they have found that the present system is far more popular than a different system would be amongst the pensioners themselves, and that thriftless persons among naval pensioners are few. In the circumstances, the Admiralty would not be justified in making the change in question.

MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe): Would it not be possible for pensions to be paid quarterly to the guardians and by them paid out weekly to the pensioners?

MR. MCKENNA: I should be pleased to consider any proposal of that kind, but I do not think I should be justified in promising to alter a system which gives satisfaction to the vast majority of those concerned.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give a return of the board of guardians which have passed these resolutions.

MR. MCKENNA: I shall be pleased to give that information.

AN HON. MEMBER asked whether the First Lord of the Admiralty consulted the War Office before arriving at a decision?

MR. McKENNA said he did not know that there was any analogy between the cases of naval and War Office pensioners.

Army Pensions.

MR. GODFREY BARING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that several boards of guardians have passed resolutions requesting the War Office to arrange for the weekly payment of Army pensions; and whether he can hold out any hope that these requests will be complied with in the near future.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): The War Office has received several resolutions on this subject from boards of guardians. As I informed the hon. Member for North Salford, on the 25th February last, arrangements have been made for monthly or weekly payment of Army pensions through boards of guardians or otherwise, in individual cases where the pensioners so desire, or when the pensioner is of such a character as to make this course desirable. But as pensions are paid quarterly in advance, to introduce universal weekly payments would not in the majority of cases be in the interests of the pensioners. The question of making weekly payments through the Post Office will be considered when the arrangements for the payment of old-age pensions are in working order.

Press Prosecutions in India.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the case of one Fazl Hassan, editor of a monthly magazine, the Urdu-i-Mualla, who has been sentenced by the magistrate of Aligarh to two years hard labour and a fine of Rs. 500 for publishing an article adversely criticising British educational policy in Egypt; and whether he will make inquiry into the facts with a view to the remission or modification of this sentence.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): It is open to the accused in this case to appeal to the High Court for a remission or modification of this sentence.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): Is this the editor who in addressing the jury said he was only following in the footsteps of the hon. Members for Sleaford and East Nottingham?

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): And could he do better than follow in their footsteps?

SIR H. COTTON: Was not this a conviction for adversely criticising the policy of the Government in Egypt, and does such criticism amount to sedition in India?

MR. BUCHANAN: My hon. friend is asking the Secretary of State to interfere with the judgment of the Court, but inasmuch as the accused has a right of appeal he declines to do so.

SIR H. COTTON: Has the appeal been lodged?

MR. BUCHANAN: I cannot say.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): Will inquiry be made into the facts as set forth in the Question?

MR. BUCHANAN: It would be unusual and improper on the part of the authorities here to institute an inquiry in a case where the accused has the right of appeal.

Government Pensioners and Political Agitation in India.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to a recent notification in the Central Provinces Gazette depriving one Sheoraj Singh, a retired tuhzildar, of his pension on the ground of his participation in political agitation; whether he can state the specific character of the agitation in which this retired official took part; and whether he will make inquiries into the facts of this case with a view to the reversal of the orders passed.

MR. BUCHANAN: The details of the conduct of Sheoraj Singh, in consequence of which he was deprived of his pension under Article 351 of the Pension Code, have not been reported to the Secretary of State. It is open to Sheoraj Singh to submit an appeal in the usual manner against the order, if he desires to do so.

SIR H. COTTON: Has he done so? Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry into this case, which appears to be of a peculiarly scandalous nature?

MR. BUCHANAN: No, Sir. The accused has the right of appeal. Whether he has done so, I cannot say, but the Government cannot interfere.

*MR. REES: Does the rule under which this officer was deprived of his pension apply, and if not, should it not apply to all classes of pensioners of the Government of India?

MR. BUCHANAN: That is a question of a far-reaching character of which I must have notice.

SIR H. COTTON: Am I to understand the Government of India hold that if a pensioner takes part in a political agitation he is liable to be deprived of his pension?

MR. BUCHANAN: I cannot give a general answer to such a general Question. I have answered the Question on the Paper.

Indian Seditious Cases.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to what is known as the Karur seditious case, in which a young man of nineteen years of age has been sentenced by the Judge of Coimbatore to five years transportation for making two seditious speeches, although he tendered an apology to the Government at the beginning of the trial and the assessors in Court strongly recommended him to mercy; and whether he will make inquiry into the facts of this case with a view to the remission or modification of the sentence.

MR. BUCHANAN: In this case also it is open to the accused to appeal to the High Court.

MR. LUPTON asked whether there was still in India anything in the nature of free speech and a free Press.

MR. BUCHANAN: Yes; a great deal of it.

Land Sales in Crown Colonies.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the revenue of several of the Crown Colonies, as given in the various annual Colonial Reports, includes moneys received for the purchase of land; and whether he will issue instructions that land sales be kept distinct from annual revenue in future, in order to give a juster account of the Colonies' financial position.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): It is already the rule that in the Estimates the proceeds of the sale of Government lands should be kept distinct from the total revenue from other sources, and directions will be given that these headings shall be kept separate in the annual Colonial Reports.

Northern Nigeria Taxation.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the abolition of the caravan tax in Northern Nigeria has been counter-balanced yet by the anticipated increase in land revenue in that Colony.

COLONEL SEELY: Actual figures are not available, but the Governor estimates that the land revenue will this year produce £41,000 more than in 1906-07, when the caravan tolls were abolished. The tolls were then bringing in about £33,000 a year.

Gold Coast Land Sales.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any revenue is derived from land in the northern territories of the Gold Coast; whether there is still an annual deficit on the administration of the northern territories; and whether he will take steps to find out if the system of land tenure and taxation working successfully in Northern Nigeria could be introduced into the northern territories of the Gold Coast also.

COLONEL SEELY: No revenue is derived from land in the northern territories of the Gold Coast. There is an annual deficit, which is made good from the revenues of the Gold Coast. The difficulties in the way of introducing the Northern Nigeria system into these territories were explained in the Answer given to a similar Question by my hon. friend on the 6th February last.

Uganda Lands.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a scheme propounded by the Land Officer of Uganda whereby leading natives are to be allowed to dispose of a percentage of the natives' land to white settlers; has such a scheme been sanctioned; who receives the money paid for the land; and why is a totally different theory as to native rights to land and the power of individual natives to alienate land to whites held in the East Coast from that held in the West Coast Colonies.

COLONEL SEELY: The Secretary of State is not aware of the existence of any such scheme as that to which my hon. friend refers. He has on the contrary recently approved of a law by which natives of the Uganda Kingdom are forbidden to alienate land to non-natives without the consent not only of the Governor, but also of the Lukiko, or Native Council. The total quantity of native land permanently alienated since 1900 is 29½ acres only.

MR. WEDGWOOD: Why is it the natives in East Africa can alienate land to whites whereas they are not allowed to do so in West Africa?

COLONEL SEELY: I think the Answer I have given covers the point raised by my hon. friend.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the instructions issued by the Colonial Office to the East African Protectorate declaring that lands shall only be leased to whites at revisable rents and not permanently alienated, and in view of the fact that a similar policy has now been adopted by the German Government in their Colonies, he can see his way to stop the granting by the Government of freehold to whites in Uganda.

COLONEL SEELY: Applications to purchase the freehold of land in Uganda have hitherto been so infrequent that it has not been thought necessary to restrict the grant of such applications except by laying down that the assent of the Secretary of State must be obtained to any grant involving the alienation of more than 1,000 acres. The Secretary of State will be happy to consider the suggestion made by my hon. friend.

*MR. REES: May I ask whether the Colonial Office contemplates a policy which postulates the disqualification of white men?

COLONEL SEELY: The words of the supplementary Question are so long that I can hardly understand them.

Uganda Company.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a company calling itself the Uganda Company has acquired 5,000 acres of land in Uganda; and, if so, on what terms did they acquire this concession and what price did they pay, or what rent are they going to pay, and to whom.

COLONEL SEELY: Permission was given to the Uganda Company in the year 1905 to purchase 10,000 acres of land in Uganda in freehold. It appears from the latest returns that the Company have actually so far acquired 4,715 acres. The price paid to the Government of Uganda was Rupees 8266.

Transvaal Retrenched Civil Servants.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Return of Transvaal Retrenched Civil Servants is now ready; and when will it be laid upon the Table.

COLONEL SEELY: The greater part of the information has just been received, and it is being put into print; the remainder is expected by the next mail, and I expect to be able to lay the Paper in the course of the next fortnight.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Will the Return include civil servants on the Railways, the Constabulary, and the Johannesburg police?

COLONEL SEELY: Yes, I think all those categories are included in the Return.

Orange River Education Bill.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Education Bill passed by the Orange River Colony Legislature was submitted in its final form to this Government; and whether it has received the assent of the Crown.

COLONEL SEELY: The Bill was not submitted to the Secretary of State as a whole in its final form, but the Governor kept him informed by telegraph of the Amendments which were made in it. The Governor has given his assent.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Do we understand that the Government have given their assent to the principles of this Education Bill passed by the Orange River Colony?

COLONEL SEELY: The Governor has given his assent, but of course the Bill will come home in the usual way to the Secretary of State in order that he may advise His Majesty thereon.

New Hebrides Convention.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingwinford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the minimum height of children recruited under the terms of the New Hebrides Convention has yet been fixed.

I beg also to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what steps have been taken to ensure separate housing accommodation for unmarried men and women under the New Hebrides Convention.

COLONEL SEELY: His Majesty's Government have issued instructions to their officers prohibiting the recruiting of women and children in the New Hebrides.

France and the New Hebrides.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the French Government have prohibited the recruiting of women and children for service in New Caledonia.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. J. A. PEASE, Essex, Saffron Walden). The instructions issued by the French Government in 1907 to the French High Commissioner in the New Hebrides with regard to the question of native labour, contained the provision that in all recruiting licences issued, a clause should be inserted forbidding women and children to be taken out of the group, with the exception of those who might accompany the head of their family. My right hon. friend would call the attention of the hon. Member to the above mentioned instructions, as quoted in the New Hebrides Blue-book, containing the notes exchanged between the United Kingdom and France on the 29th August, 1907, (Cd. 3876, Treaty Series No. 3, 1908.)

Imports of Drugs into China.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the edict of the Chinese Government banning the introduction into and manufacture and sale within the empire of morphia and hypodermic appliances indicates that the suppression of the use of opium implies recourse to other drugs in place thereof; and whether the Foreign Office is in possession of any information to show that this is the case.

MR. J. A. PEASE: The prohibition of the general importation of morphia into China, except on certain conditions, was agreed to by His Majesty's Government in Article XI of the Commercial Treaty between China and Great Britain of 1902. The stipulation contained in that article, that the prohibition should only come into force on all other Treaty Powers agreeing to its conditions, has, however, only recently been fulfilled. The edict has, therefore, no direct connection with the measures adopted for the suppression of the use of opium. Whether the suppression of the use of opium in China, if successfully accomplished, would have to any extent the effect indicated in the Question is a matter on which my right hon. friend cannot express an opinion. It is not implied in the edict.

Gun Running in Persia.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that several caravans of arms have passed through Persia to Afghanistan; and whether, since it is impossible for the Government of India to stop this traffic while the Persian route is open, representations have been made to the Shah's Government on the subject.

MR. J. A. PEASE: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. As regards the second part, representations were made at the time to the Persian Government, and His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Teheran reported that the Persian local authorities did their best to comply with the orders sent from the central Government and to check the progress of the caravans. His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Teheran was instructed to make further representations as to the importance attached by His Majesty's Government to the interception of caravans conveying illicit arms from the coast through Persia territory into Afghanistan.

Old Age Pensions.

MR. TIMOTHY DAVIES (Fulham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can state the number of applications received up to date for old age pensions, giving the number claiming 1s., 2s., 3s., 4s., and 5s. respectively.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I have called for a Return on this subject, and I hope very shortly to be in possession of the total number of applications received up to date.

Revenue for Taxation on Alcohol.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, as regards the first half of the current financial year, the revenue from the alcoholic group of taxes continues on the downward course indicated by the last Budget statement.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes Sir. The following figures show the approximate net receipt for the first six months of the financial years 1907-8 and 1908-9 respectively:—

		Beer Duty.	Spirit Duty.
1907-8, to 30th September, 1907	- -	6,790,213	8,254,537
1908-9, to 30th September, 1908	- -	6,616,807	7,938,934
Decrease	- -	173,406	315,603

MR. BOTTOMLEY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of this continued automatic decrease in the consumption of alcoholic liquor, he thinks it worth while further occupying the attention of Parliament with the Licensing Bill?

[No Answer was returned.]

Old Age Pension Regulations.*

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the instructions issued to pension officers by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The instructions referred to are of a confidential nature and intended for Departmental use only, and it would not be in accordance with precedent to lay such instructions upon the Table. They have no validity except as directions by the Board of Inland Revenue to their own officers, and it is not, in my opinion, to the interests of the public service that they should be published in any form. It is a matter for regret that reports as to the subject matter of the Instructions in question should have appeared in the Press, but such reports are wholly without authority. The only Instructions to Pension Officers of which Pension Committees or the public generally are required to take any cognizance are those contained in the Second Schedule to the Old Age Pensions Regulations, 1908.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that what purports to be a copy of this report has been published in one of the leading London newspapers, and whether in those circumstances he does not think the House of Commons is entitled to authentic information?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not think these instructions ought to be published. Such instructions are constantly given with regard to every branch of the service. Instructions of this kind are issued by the Board of Inland Revenue on their own responsibility to their officers. They have no validity beyond the fact that they are instructions to officers, and it is a most improper proceeding to communicate them to the Press. I think it would be a mistake and a breach of a very valuable precedent if we published instructions of this character.

LORD R. CECIL: These instructions purport to direct the attention of officers to what they are to take into consideration in estimating the means of the claimant. Does not that necessarily mean a modification of the terms of the Act of Parliament, and is not the House entitled to know at any rate what steps the Government are taking to carry out the decision arrived at by this House?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The noble Lord has given notice of a Question on that point to-morrow, and I think it would be better to postpone the consideration of the matter till then.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to paragraphs 53 and 54 of the instructions issued by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to pension officers directing them to retain their reports on claims for pensions until a supervisor shall have had an opportunity of examining them and satisfying himself that the investigation has been properly made and the proper conclusion arrived at, and that such reports are not to be forwarded until initialled by the supervisor, who is directed to forward the reports himself to the clerk of the local pension committee; and whether, in view of the provisions of the Act which places the responsibility for the performance of these duties solely on the pension officer, and does not recognise the intervention of the supervisor, he will give instructions for the procedure to be modified so as to leave the responsible pension officer full discretion and independence, and enable the machinery of the Act to work with greater smoothness and rapidity.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Any instructions which have been given to pension officers by the Board of Inland Revenue are, as I pointed out in reply to the preceding Question, of a confidential character. I may, however, say, to correct misapprehensions which appear to have arisen, that all supervisors of excise have been appointed by the Treasury to be pension officers, and that the supervisor in charge of each district is the pension officer responsible for submitting reports on claims and questions to the pension committee.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to paragraphs 102, 103, and 104 of the instructions to pension officers issued by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue which deal with the subject of lost pension order-books, and direct that a pensioner losing an order-book shall be deprived of his pension pending investigation of the matter by the pension officer, who is directed to issue a new book, if he is satisfied of the loss of the former book, dating only from the next Friday following the date of delivery; and whether, in view of the fact that some time is likely to lapse during the investigation of the loss by the pension officer, he will direct that such instruction be amended by the issue of temporary order forms or in some other way, so that the pensioner shall not be deprived of his pension during the period of investigation before the issue of the new order-book.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: In cases of lost order-books every effort will be made to issue a new book with as little delay as is consistent with the making of the necessary investigations. I do not think there would be any advantage in adopting the suggestion made in the Question, since the same investigations would be necessary before "temporary order forms" could be issued. It is not anticipated that cases of lost books will be numerous, and it is not desirable that such loss should be wholly unattended by inconvenience to the pensioner, to whose carelessness it will as a rule be due.

Sugar Duty.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state why it is that, as shown on page 15 of the last Report of the Commissioners of Customs, the duty on British refined sugar was levied at an appreciably lower average rate per hundredweight than that on foreign refined sugar; and can he also explain why, as shown on the same page of the Report, the duty on cane and other sorts of unrefined sugar was levied at an average rate per hundredweight considerably less than that on unrefined beet-root sugar.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE: The hon. Member appears to be under a misapprehension in supposing that the duty on sugar is leviable at average rates. The rates, whether in cane or beet, or British or foreign refined, vary according to the degree of polarisation as set out on pages 44 and 45 of the Report referred to. The table at the foot of page 15 of that Report shows merely the aggregate of the quantities of each description of sugar on which duty, at varying rates, was paid during the year, and the amount of duty received.

Inter-Parliamentary Congress.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has entered into any engagement on behalf of the Government to assist the Inter-Parliamentary Congress by the payment of £300 a year or any other sum; and, if so, will a Supplementary Estimate be presented, or from what source will the money be provided.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE. Yes, Sir, I have undertaken to propose to Parliament the provision of an annual grant to the Inter-Parliamentary Union of a sum not exceeding £300, on learning that the permanent secretariat of the Union has been established on a satisfactory basis. I am not aware that any contribution will be required during the present financial year, and I do not therefore anticipate that any Supplementary Estimate will be necessary. I understand that other countries also propose to contribute.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): Will steps be taken to ensure that the delegations to this Congress are really representative?

EARL WINTERTON: And will the right hon. Gentleman ascertain what grants are made by other Parliaments, and especially by Germany?

MR. FELL: Do the Government propose to take control in any way over the selection of representatives of this Parliament?

MR. LLOYD GEORGE said he understood that it was open to every Member of Parliament who took an interest in this movement to attend the conferences if he wished, and in that sense, therefore, they were perfectly representative.

Club Registration.

MR. BOTTOMLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state the total number of clubs which have been struck off the register under the provisions of the Act of 1902, and how many of these were struck off on the ground that there was frequent drunkenness on the club premises.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The number of clubs struck off the registers under the Licensing Act of 1902 are given in the Annual Volumes of Licensing Statistics, and are as follows:—In the year 1903, sixty-seven; in 1904, seventy-three; in 1905, sixty-two; in 1906, forty-one; and in 1907, seventy-eight. As regards the latter part of the Question, I can only repeat the Answer which I gave the hon. Member for the Skipton Division of Yorkshire, to the effect that I do not possess information as to the grounds on which the clubs were struck off, and I regret I do not see my way to obtaining it.

Metropolitan Police Superintendents.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is any intention to appoint military or naval officers to the position of superintendents of the Metropolitan Police.

MR. GLADSTONE: There is no such intention.

Statistical Abstract.

MR. BOWLES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state why the Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom, which, in 1905 was issued in August, and has usually been issued soon after that month in other years, has this year not yet been issued.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir H. KEARLEY, Devonport): The issue of the Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom has been somewhat delayed with a view to the inclusion of certain additional information respecting the expenditure, by local authorities, on account of particular services. The volume is now practically ready for press and it is intended to issue it within the next fortnight.

Pay of Senior Postmen.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he has now considered the recommendations of the Select Committee, so far as they affect the class of senior postmen and lobby officers, which he stated on the 17th May last were engaging his attention and in respect of which he promised an early decision; and can he say when payment will be made of the arrears due in consequence of any increase in the scale of pay, which is to take effect from January last.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The scheme of the Parliamentary Committee affecting the class of senior postmen and lobby officers is in course of being completed. The pay of the officers concerned will where necessary be adjusted as from the 1st of January last.

Vaccination at Twickenham.

MR. LUPTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if his attention has been called to the action of Dr. Adams, medical inspector of the St. Stephen's School, St. Margaret's Twickenham, who examined the children for vaccination marks and reported the unvaccinated ones to the vaccination officer; if his attention has been called to the action of the school nurse in calling upon the parents with regard to the vaccination of the children; and if he proposes to take any action to prevent the repetition of this conduct.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury): My attention has been called to this matter and I have made inquiry into the circumstances of the case, which is receiving my consideration. The Board have never suggested to local education authorities that they should, as part of the work of medical inspection under the Act of 1907, inquire whether school children have or have not been vaccinated. If inquiries are made on this point by any local education authority, the information obtained should be regarded as strictly confidential as between the local education authority and the parents of the children concerned, and as confidential ought not to be communicated to the vaccination officer or public vaccinator. I may add that I strongly deprecate any attempt on the part of local authorities to use the machinery of medical inspection for the purpose of enforcing vaccination. Such action is likely to discredit medical inspection in the eyes of many parents who would otherwise be glad to take advantage of it.

Government Education Bill.

MR. BLACK (Bedfordshire, Biggleswade): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education on what date he proposes to proceed with the Committee stage of the Elementary Education (England and Wales) Bill.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I am not in a position to make any statement.

Mr. Thorne, M.P., and the Unemployed.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General whether his attention has been called to the language used by the hon. Member for South West Ham, to the effect that if those he was addressing wanted to rush anything, they should rush every bakers' shop they could see; and whether he intends to advise that any legal proceedings should be taken against the hon. Member in respect of his words.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields): This matter appears to me at present to be one for the police, and I think the noble Lord will scarcely expect me to say what legal proceedings ought to be taken until my advice is asked.

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.) inquired whether it would be within the province of the Home Secretary to bring the matter before the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

LORD R. CECIL asked whether the matter was one which was engaging the attention of the Government.

SIR W. ROBSON: I have no doubt the matter is one which is engaging the attention of the police.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.) inquired whether the Attorney-General had any information relating to the numerous instances of incitement to crime on the part of the political associates of the noble Lord, and whether he had any information as to the noble Lord ever having repudiated these incitements.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should give notice of that Question.

Sasine Office, Edinburgh.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether a scheme of compulsory life insurance has been made a condition of employment in all future appointments of engrossing clerks in the Sasine Office in Edinburgh; if so, whether he can state the particulars of the scheme; and whether such clerks will be free to select the company in which they prefer to insure.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The

Answer is in the affirmative. I shall be happy to furnish the hon. Member with particulars of the scheme of assurance which has been arranged.

MR. YOUNGER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last part of the Question?

MR. SINCLAIR: I have said I shall be glad to furnish particulars.

Grants to Irish Teachers.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the sum of £114,000 passed on 28th July last for bonuses and capitation grants to Irish teachers for the year ending 31st March last was still unpaid to them at a recent date, and will he say what has caused this delay; and whether he will arrange that in future these grants will be paid more promptly.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): May I also ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the grant of £114,000, voted for the augmentation of the salaries of national school teachers for the year ended 31st March 1908, has been paid by the Treasury.

MR. MACCAW (Down, W.): And may I too ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so, what, portion of the revised Supplementary Estimate of £114,000 for bonuses and capitation grants for Irish teachers, passed under closure on the 28th July last, has yet been paid to the teachers, and if such payment has been made, for what period.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The grant in question has been made available by the Treasury, and the Commissioners of National Education are making arrangements for its distribution among the teachers, which, it is anticipated, will take place about the 23rd instant. Some delay has necessarily taken place in making arrangements for the distribution of the first issue of this grant, but it is proposed in future years to pay the grant in April, immediately after the conclusion of the financial year.

Irish Land Stock Flotation.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government has yet formulated any plan for avoiding or minimising loss on flotation of Irish Land Stock and for expediting the operation of the Land Act of 1903; and, if so, when he proposes to lay the same before the House.

MR. BIRRELL: The matter is receiving the careful consideration of the Government, but though I am not yet in a position to make any statement on the subject, I hope to be able to do so shortly.

Clare Cattle-drives.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 6th September, Mr. H. V. Macnamara, of Ennistymon House, County Clare, sent warning to Dublin Castle that cattle-drives were contemplated upon his Doolin property; why no preventive measures were taken upon that intimation; whether cattle-drives took place on the 9th, 12th, 19th, and 22nd of September, in which cattle were treated with great cruelty; whether he is aware that these proceedings were instigated by the United Irish League; and whether he intends to take proceedings against the persons who instigated and organised these disorderly occurrences.

MR. BIRRELL: I received from Mr. Macnamara a letter dated 6th September, complaining of a meeting of the United Irish League on the preceding Sunday, but making no reference to cattle-driving. It is the fact that cattle-drives took place on the dates mentioned in the Question. As regards the alleged cruelty to the cattle, I am informed that claims for compensation for injury to the cattle are pending, and it would, therefore, be undesirable to make any statement which would prejudice the matter. I have no information that these cattle-drives were instigated or organised by the United Irish League. Forty-four persons were proceeded against for taking part in the cattle-drives, and of these one gave bail to keep the peace, and forty-three were sent to prison in default of bail. The police force of County Clare has been largely increased with the object of dealing with these agrarian disturbances, and fifty of the extra force are quartered in a house rented from Mr. Macnamara in the neighbourhood of his property.

Outrages in Clare.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 13th September a farmer named Casey was fired at near Ruan; that on the 15th September there was an attempt to shoot Mr. James Griffin, J.P., at Kinlea; that on the 30th September an attack with firearms was made upon the residence of Mrs. Greathead at Lough George; that on the 5th October the house of a farmer named Cahir, near Ennis, was fired into; and whether, in view of these and other similar outrages, and the increase in the use of firearms in agrarian disturbances, he proposes to take any measures to check this evil.

MR. BIRRELL: The facts are as stated in the Question, save for slight discrepancies as to dates. The police force of County Clare has been largely augmented, and all possible measures are being taken for the prevention and detection of offences. The persons concerned are receiving all necessary protection.

Crime Returns for Irish Judges.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the remarks of Judge Curran at the Birr quarter sessions on 7th October, and to his complaint that by direction of the Government a Judge of Assize and Chairmen of Quarter Sessions are not now allowed to be informed as to the state of the county as formerly; and whether it is intended to continue this course.

MR. BIRRELL: My attention has been called to a newspaper report of the remarks referred to. I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to a Question put by the hon. and gallant Member for East Down on 22nd July, from which it will be seen that the Returns furnished to Judges of Assize are prepared in accordance with the forms approved by the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland in 1904. It has not been the practice to furnish County Court Judges with those Returns, but, for some reason of which I am not aware, an exception has been made in the case of Judge Curran. The Returns supplied to him are in the same form as those furnished to Judges of assize.

Dairy Regulations in Ireland.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that opposition has been shown in the rural parts of Ireland to the general Order of the Local Government Board for Ireland (No. 24 M/1908) with respect to dairies, cowsheds and milkshops; that this feeling is largely due to the discrimination made between farmers and cowkeepers who sell milk to creameries for manufacture into butter and those who make their own milk into butter; and whether it is intended to recall this order and apply the regulations equally to all classes of dairy farmers in Ireland.

MR. BIRRELL: The Order in question applies equally to all persons engaged in the public supply of milk. Its object is to prevent the spread of disease by means of the milk supply, and therefore it deals only with persons engaged in such supply, as contemplated by the Act under which the Order was made. I am aware that some opposition to the Order has been shown, but its provisions are very necessary in the interests of the public health, and it is not intended to withdraw it.

Knocknagown Outrage.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at Knocknagown, County Kerry, a rural postman was, on 5th October, robbed by an armed man of registered letters supposed to contain civil bill processes; and whether any arrest has been made in connection with this occurrence.

MR. BIRRELL: I am informed that the fact is as stated in the Question. The postman, who reported the matter to the police, stated that he was unable to identify his assailant, and therefore no arrest has been possible.

Ireland and the Nurses Registration Bill.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received representations that the proposal to postpone the application to Ireland of the provisions of the Nurses Registration Bill will inflict injury upon Irish nurses and training institutions in Ireland; and whether, in view of these considerations, he will move the Irish Local Government Board to make an effort to surmount the administrative obstacles which have led them to oppose the application of this measure to Ireland.

MR. BIRRELL: The Government have placed upon the Paper Amendments providing for the immediate application to Ireland of the Nurses Registration Bill.

Intermediate Education Ireland.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received representations that Rule 14 (b) in the rules of Examinations for 1909, made by the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland, will be detrimental to the interests of education and will deprive many youths of a chance of obtaining an exhibition; whether this rule has been made solely from motives of economy; whether he will bring the matter to the notice of the Intermediate Education Board with a view to its being reconsidered; and whether he proposes to afford the House any opportunity of discussing the matter.

MR. BIRRELL: The question whether the operation of the rule referred to should be postponed until after the next examination, is at present before the Intermediate Education Board, and will come up for further consideration at their next meeting.

MR. LONSDALE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the headmasters in Ireland object very strongly to this rule on educational grounds, and he states that they are willing to forego their fees on the second course if the prohibition is withdrawn.

*MR. BIRRELL: There are two questions involved, the merits of the rule and the equity of giving notice. The general feeling is that notice should have been given.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the rules for the coming year were only circulated last August.

MR. BIRRELL: Yes, Sir.

Catholic Disabilities.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the terms of the Catholic Disabilities Removal Bill which was introduced by the hon. Member for Kilkenny in several successive years on behalf of the Irish Party; and whether he is prepared to offer facilities for the carrying into law of this Bill, or will the Government introduce a Bill to the same purpose.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester): I beg also to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government will on an early date introduce legislation repealing such statutory enactments affecting Roman Catholics as place them in a disadvantageous and inferior position compared with other religious bodies in the country.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): My attention had not previously been called to the Bill referred to. The Government have no present intention of introducing legislation in this matter, and as I announced before the recess they cannot give facilities to any measure which is not of a wholly non-controversial character. They will be prepared to give full consideration to any proposals to relieve Roman Catholics, or any other religious denomination from legal disabilities which give rise to practical grievance.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the very strong feeling upon this subject, he could not see his way to grant facilities for legislation proposed by private Members; and whether it was not a fact that in 1891 the late Mr. Gladstone himself introduced a measure for the purpose of relieving Catholics of certain disabilities; whether that measure was not eloquently supported by the present Prime Minister and the whole Liberal Party, and only failed to become law because it was unitedly and strenuously opposed by the Conservative Party then in power.

MR. ASQUITH: I think the Bill to which the hon. Member refers was one to remove the disability of the Lord-Lieutenant and also of the Lord Chancellor. I strongly supported that Bill, and should do so again. But I cannot promise more at present than to give full consideration to any proposal brought forward.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said that in consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the Answer, he would himself reintroduce the Bill, which had been before the House for many years. He added that it was generally expected that the Government would give facilities.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT: Arising out of the very unsatisfactory reply of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will give a day to discuss the conduct of the Government in regard to the action they took with reference to the recent intended procession.

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir, certainly not, unless the Leader of the Opposition desires it.

MR. MOORE: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries into the disabilities that Protestants suffer from Roman Catholic Spain?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND invited the right hon. Gentleman to be good enough to bear in mind the very strong feeling which had been aroused over this question, for the disability which Catholics suffered was regarded by a great number of the population as little short of a disgrace to the name of civilisation.

The Government and the Unemployed.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the amount of suffering caused by the present state of unemployment, he can state when the Government will be in a position to inform the House what it proposes to do to alleviate the distress, and when a day can be given to discuss the subject.

MR. ASQUITH: I am not as yet in a position to make any statement; but I hope to be able to do so next week.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON : Can not the right hon. Gentleman give me a little more definite assurance, seeing that this question is becoming most acute. I had hoped for an assurance that we should have a statement by Monday.

MR. ASQUITH : I cannot say more than I have. I am quite as much alive as the hon. Gentleman to the importance of the question. That is all the more reason for careful deliberation.

MR. KEIR HARDIE asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would give the House time to discuss his statement on the same day.

MR. ASQUITH : No, Sir ; I shall make my statement in answer to a Question in the ordinary way.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON said he had asked for a day to discuss the proposals.

MR. ASQUITH : I think the hon. Gentleman had better wait to hear what my statement is. I am not at all without hope that it may satisfy him without the necessity of a discussion. If not, we may be able to meet his natural wish.

MR. CURRAN (Durham, Jarrow) : Considering the urgency of the matter, cannot the right hon. Gentleman make his statement this week ?

MR. ASQUITH : No, Sir ; I cannot.

Irish Land Act Finance.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.) : I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he now proposes to make his promised statement re the finances of The Irish Land Act, 1903.

MR. ASQUITH : The matter is well advanced, and I hope a statement will be made very soon. I cannot as yet fix the exact date.

MR. BARRIE : In view of the increasing urgency of this matter may we hope for the statement next week ?

MR. ASQUITH : I hope so, but I cannot say definitely.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) : Will the statement be made in a form which will admit of discussion ?

MR. ASQUITH : When the time comes we will try and provide opportunities.

English Land Valuation Bill.

MR. WEDGWOOD : I beg to ask the Prime Minister when it is intended to introduce the Land Valuation Bill for England.

MR. ASQUITH : After full consideration the Government have come to the conclusion that as no effective progress could be made with the Bill this year, it will be better to postpone its introduction until next session.

MR. WEDGWOOD reminded the right hon. Gentleman that several promises were given before the holidays that this Bill should be dealt with this session. What was the reason for the altered decision ?

MR. ASQUITH replied that one was the regrettable indisposition of the President of the Local Government Board, which lasted for over a month.

[WOMEN IN THE LOBBY.

*MR. HAMAR GREENWOOD (York) : I rise, Sir, to call attention to a matter involving the privileges of Members of this House, and to ask you—and I hope that my request will be supported by hon. Members—to take steps to exclude all women absolutely from the inner, or Members' lobby of this House, during its sittings. In support of this request may I state briefly that I make it without any consideration whatever of the questions of franchise or of any recent incidents. There has been an increasing difficulty in the Members' lobby because of these visitors, and during the months of June and July it became almost impossible for hon. Members to enter or to leave the Chamber by the inner door. In addition I would remind the House, some hon. Members of which seem to have more regard for feminine approval than for the dignity of this great Chamber, that as things are at present there is placed on the admirable and efficient staff of attendants and police a burden which is unreasonable, ungenerous and unfair. Further, as we saw yesterday, the elementary rules of courtesy were violated in a way that I had hoped was restricted to pagan tribes in remote parts of the world. I think, therefore, that the time has come when the House in its own interest as a serious institution—and I am one of those who think that the House is a serious institution—should take the steps that I suggest. I make the suggestion on my own responsibility and with the sole object of maintaining the dignity of this Assembly.

*MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that I believe ever since the House was built—certainly for a great number of years—the privilege has been accorded to ladies of visiting the Members' lobby. There was a time, now a good many years ago, when the privilege was not very much used. Of late years, however, the privilege has been very much more largely used, especially, I think, during this Parliament. I should hesitate of my own accord to withdraw the privilege, unless I were assured that I had the general sense of the House behind me in doing so. Therefore, for the present, I do not think that I should be right in issuing the order which the hon. Member suggests. At the same time, I have taken upon myself, in consequence of what occurred yesterday, to issue an order that no ladies are to be brought past the doorkeepers. I have been reluctantly compelled to do this; but in order to protect the position and the dignity of the House, after what occurred yesterday, it would be necessary largely to increase the staff of doorkeepers, which I think the House would consider to be very undesirable.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 2:

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsa-ham) moved the omission of subsection (1).

VOL. CXCIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

He said he did so not only because he believed that local option, or local veto, as he preferred to call it, was bad in principle and had always proved a disastrous and doleful failure, but also because its introduction in that clause was out of place, having regard to the fact that the Bill was already overloaded with very controversial matter of an entirely different kind. He was unable to trace any real connection between the main or avowed principle of the Bill and this subsection dealing with local option. The Bill dealt with the reduction of public-houses on an organised plan and the putting of further financial burdens upon the trade, and while it was not in order to discuss that point, it in itself was of great importance and of a far-reaching character, and therefore the question of local option was quite out of place. Looking at the Bill, one was struck by the fact that it appeared to have two authors. On the one hand, the Government seemed to have been the authors of that part of the Bill designed for the robbing of the hen-roosts, and the other part seemed distinctly to be due to the authorship of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley and his temperance friends, who, like bulls in a china shop, had been attempting to crash into everything connected with the trade. On the question of principle, however, it was quite as important that the Committee should pause before they passed this subsection. It was a principle which had never before been adopted in any Act which had been passed by that House. It had never before been possible for a small clique or knot of residents in any locality to forbid a perfectly legitimate trade being carried on in that locality, and the seriousness of the principle was one which could not be over-estimated. If carried to its logical conclusion it might mean that eventually a few fanatics would be able to prevent all sorts of legitimate trades being carried on in a locality. It was not a bit more absurd than the proposal in this Bill to imagine a case in years to come in which vegetarians might combine and prohibit all butchers' shops in a certain locality. That was on all fours with the proposal in this clause, and it might be carried further in a great many other cases. For instance, if the hon. Member for Sleaford and his friends ever became popular and powerful in the country, they could prohibit vaccination in a certain area. If this principle were adopted, there was no knowing to what extent it might not be carried in the future, and he would remind the Committee that it was a principle which had always been unpopular. He did not propose to go into the whole question of cases where local veto had been tried in other countries, but he would respectfully challenge the Prime Minister to give any instances of cases in other countries where it had been a success. There were isolated instances all over the world where it had been tried, but in nine cases out of ten it had been found to be a disastrous and doleful failure—in such cases, for instance, as Canada, New Zealand and Australia. A point which had never been answered by the Government was how they were going, if they adopted the local option suggested in this section, to get over the difficulty of the scandal which had invariably ensued when there were great restrictions upon the licensing trade in one locality while just over the border no such restrictions existed. Everybody who knew the cases in the past, where restrictions had been put on the licensing trade on Sundays in certain parts of England, knew that in the neighbouring districts terrible scandals had ensued, and the temperance party themselves had put that point to the Government, and it had never been answered. Perhaps, of all the reasons which could be urged against the adoption of this subsection, the best was its exceedingly undemocratic character. The Government proposed to allow people to decide whether there should be no public-houses, but they did not propose to allow them to decide whether there should be more public-houses. That was a point on which he thought everyone on that side of the House joined issue with the Government. It was one of the most extraordinary and undemocratic proposals ever put in a Bill by a so-called democratic Government, and the case was very well given away by a certain Mr. Malins, an official of the Temperance Federation, writing in the Morning Leader about a year ago. He was challenged in the Manchester

Earl Winterton.

Guardian, and was told that if local option was to be a really democratic measure it should be allowed for the people to decide whether they would have more public-houses as well as less, and Mr. Malins answered that no Anglo-Saxon Government would dare to put the liquor traffic on that basis. That was the Government's idea of democracy, and of trusting the people. But Mr. Malins was wrong, because two Anglo-Saxon Governments—those of South Australia and New South Wales, he believed—had put the liquor traffic on that basis. In other words, they had given real local option. The Government did not do it, he imagined, because Mr. Malins was expressing their views when he said that no Anglo-Saxon Government would dare to put the liquor traffic on such a basis. The whole policy of the Government was a policy of distrusting the people, tempered by hypocrisy. He challenged the Prime Minister to say what precedents there were for saying that local option would be a success, and, secondly, why the Government had refused to trust the people and allow them if they wished to vote for more public-houses as well as for less. He appealed to the Committee to consider twice before they passed this subsection, because he was convinced that they would be passing a very dangerous principle, which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would make life in this country absolutely intolerable. If they carried this principle in the Bill they would be laying the foundations of a most dangerous state of affairs, and they would eventually put the whole of the local government of England from this House into the hands of small cliques and knots of fanatics in particular residential districts. He begged to move the omission of the subsection.

Amendment proposed—

“ In page 2, line 8, to leave out subsection (1).”—(Earl Winterton.)

Question proposed, “ That the words ‘ if ’ stand part of the clause.”

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.) said he was no

going into some of the questions raised by the noble Lord in his interesting speech, because he thought he had failed to observe—at least he did not detect in any part of his speech that he had recognised—that the proposal embodied in Clause 2, so far as the next fourteen years were concerned, did not deal with existing licences at all. It dealt entirely with new licences, and it simply proposed to give the inhabitants of a district the right to say in a manner which could not possibly come into collision with any vested or existing interest whether or not either the existing supply of public-houses should be increased, or, if there were no public-houses there, whether one should be imported for the first time into their midst. That was a right which had often been exercised. The Government saw no reason why it should not be vested in the majority of the inhabitants, who were the persons primarily affected. If the noble Lord's Amendment were passed and this power were taken away, the matter would be left, as it was now, entirely in the discretion of the licensing justices. He quite agreed that when they were dealing with existing licences it was a power the use of which should be very carefully safeguarded, but when it was a question of simply a multiplication of what already existed, or the inclusion of something which was not already there, and which the majority of the people did not want to see, he confessed he was wholly at a loss to understand why the noble Lord should say it was an undemocratic measure. The Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said he could not help thinking that the Prime Minister had overlooked the answer to a Question put by the hon. Member for Westmoreland on this very clause. It was true that anyone reading the clause for the first time would naturally come to the conclusion that none but new licences, in the ordinary sense of the word, were affected. If that were the meaning of the clause it would not go very far, because during the reduction period, in consequence of what had been done in Clause 1, no new licence would be possible, unless the number of licences in a district were below the proper proportion for the area. He supposed it must have struck the hon. Member for Westmoreland that that was not very strong or satisfactory. But they must read the first section of Clause 3, which ran as follows:—

"After the termination of the reduction period compensation shall cease to be payable . . . and an application for the re-grant of any on-licence shall be treated as an application for the grant of a new licence, not as an application for the renewal of a licence."

If they read those two subsections together the result would be that after the termination of the reduction period all licences, although they might have been continually renewed for many years, would be treated as new licences, and therefore the local veto would come into operation, and it would then be in the power of a bare majority of those voting at a poll in a very narrow area absolutely and completely to prohibit all licences within their district.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he did not think the question of what would happen under Clause 3 arose here.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said it was very important that they should know precisely what, in the judgment of the Chair, they were to discuss now. As he understood it, the clause they were now discussing would practically make local option a universal rule with regard to every licence in the country at the end of fourteen years, and therefore the whole question of local option or local veto came in its fullest sense. Therefore, it would seem that this was a very appropriate place at which to discuss the general policy involved in that question.

MR. ASQUITH said that if Clause 3 were omitted from the Bill it was obvious that Clause 2 would only deal with new licences, i.e., licences not now in existence.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL (Dublin University) said the Prime Minister entirely omitted the real point of the section. The question was: What was a new licence? The Prime Minister rather suggested that it applied only to applications made for the first time, but if Clause 3 of the Bill were passed, a new licence got a wholly different signification, which would attach to the second clause in the Bill. Therefore he submitted that when they were discussing Clause 2 they must assume that a new licence there would bear the meaning that the Bill proposed to give it, and discuss it on that basis; otherwise, they were discussing it entirely in the dark.

MR. JAMES HOPE said the question of the hon. Member for Westmoreland was with reference to Clause 2. He asked distinctly whether all licences would not come under the provisions of Clause 2, and the Under-Secretary for the Home Department said "Yes."

MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) said his question related entirely to the interpretation to be placed on Clause 3.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he did not want to give a ruling not in accordance with the justice of the case, but he had considered the points put to him, and it seemed to him perfectly clear that unless Clause 3 was passed, Clause 2 would not apply, and that being the case, he thought the time when that point should be discussed, i.e., the application of the prohibition as to new licences being made to old licences as well, would be on Clause 3.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that, supposing the definition intended by the Government of a new licence was not contained in Clause 3, but in the Schedule to the Bill, surely it would be very inconvenient to defer the discussion until they got to the Schedule. They had to consider the meaning of a new licence. As the Government had framed their Bill, undoubtedly a new licence meant not only a new licence, but every licence in existence at the termination of the fourteen years. He would ask whether that consideration had been present in the Chairman's mind in giving his decision.

*THE CHAIRMAN: That consideration was present to my mind. I am very anxious to meet the wishes of the Committee, but it does seem to me that this clause is meant to apply to the granting of new on-licences at the present time, and that the other question ought to come up on Clause 3.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If you have considered that, it is not for me to make any further comment on your decision. But as a matter of convenience may I ask whether it is not a fact that on Clause 3 there must arise the whole question of the time-limit, one of the biggest questions involved in the Bill, a question which has excited the deepest feeling throughout the country, and whether it would not be of enormous convenience, as we are working under a compartment Resolution, if so big a question as local option could be discussed on a separate day from that allotted to the tremendous and all-important question of the time-limit.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I would like to ask the opinion of the Prime Minister, before settling that question, whether the wording of Clause 3—"an application for the re-grant of any on-licence shall be treated as an application for the grant of a new licence"—does not raise the whole question which is sought to be brought in on Clause 2. I think it ought to be dealt with on Clause 3. In regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman himself I am not responsible for the Resolution under which we are working. I have to do the best I can under it.

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) asked whether under the Chairman's ruling the whole series of Amendments which sought to confine the operation of Clause 2 to the reduction period would be in order.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Speaking off-hand, I think they will be in order.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich): On a point of order, may I ask whether subsection 2 of Clause 2 is not specially allocated to the first half of the sixth allotted day?

*THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of order.

*MR. SHERWELL (Huddersfield): On a point of order I desire to ask whether it will be in order under your raling to call attention to the inconsistency of Clause 2 as it now stands with the frame-work of Clause 3?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must hear the point put. I cannot deal with a general question of that kind.

*MR. JAMES HOPE, resuming his speech, said that in any case the clause affirmed the principle of local veto. This question of local veto was very old. It dated as far back as 1864, but whenever it had been brought forward it had met with very little support in the House, and less in the country. When the Licensing Commission brought in their Report, neither the majority nor the minority supported the proposal. A good many years had passed since that Report was issued, and he held that in every direction what had happened since that date had diminished rather than strengthened the case for local veto. The Report from the United States in regard to local veto, which he thought he saw in the hands of the right hon. Member for Spen Valley, undoubtedly stated that local veto might be carried out in districts where the population was sparse, but that where there was a congestion of population the system entirely broke down, and that necessarily, if only from the enormous difficulties involved in what was known as the boundary question. Some hon. Members opposite had become pretty sensible of it in connection with Sunday closing. Speaking on behalf of a deputation to the Prime Minister, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, on 13th December, 1907, Sir Thomas Whittaker—

“pressed the desirability and, indeed, necessity of making legislation on Sunday closing of national application, and not leaving it to localities to decide for themselves. Mr. Asquith asked the deputation why it should not be left to localities, to which Sir Thomas Whittaker replied: ‘Because the difficulty of drawing a border-line was enormous. If they were to have opening in one locality and closing in another, it would lead to deplorable results, as had been the case in Cardiff.’”

A large deputation, accompanied by Members of Parliament, waited last year on the Home Secretary and urged the same facts. In their Memorial they stated that—of cases and places, the border difficulty. It would increase, and in many districts hitherto free actually create, the nuisance and evil of travelling for drink which at present is one of the abuses most needing to be remedied. This would mean undoubtedly an increase in public drunkenness.”

He thought that that was where fundamentally any proposal of local veto must necessarily break down; it would be applied where least wanted, as for instance in residential districts, but it would not be applied in poorer districts where there was a large number of public-houses. The strongest case would be found in the West End of London, where there were a few public-houses which undoubtedly served a certain class of the population, such as servants and early carriers of provisions and vegetables. If there was a vote taken on the question of local veto in such a district, no doubt a great majority of the well-to-do residents who could obtain what liquor they wanted in their own houses, would either not vote at all, or vote for ‘prohibition. There were many men who had been disturbed by a street noise when drinking their last drop of whisky before going to bed, who in their selfishness would gladly get rid of the public-house at the corner, although that house served their poor neighbours in the same district, who would be undoubtedly driven over the border into another district where they could get a supply of liquor. He protested against any serious social question like this becoming the sport of caprice at popular elections. The issues were far too grave and the result should not be dependent on one local election or another. He was quite certain that if this proposal was once adopted it would lead to such a storm of popular discontent and confusion, that practical temperance proposals would suffer. It was on these grounds that he supported the Amendment of the noble Lord.

*MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) said he had listened with very considerable surprise to the speech of the hon. Member, who, as he understood, owned a large property in a county not very far from London and in respect of that property possessed an absolute power of veto, the power to prevent a single house for the sale of intoxicating liquor to be as altered, they enabled a bare majority of any licensing district, composed, as no doubt it would be, of persons who had no use whatever for any public-house, to close the whole of the remaining houses, 60,000 in number, in the Kingdom, without a penny of compensation, and without any substantial notice to the holder of the licence. He did not think any such proposal had ever yet been made—certainly not by any Government—and he could not believe until he was assured of it that the Government meant that, but unless the clause was altered, that was the real effect of the Bill.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 2, line 8, to leave out from the word ‘If,’ to the word ‘a,’ in line 9, and to insert the words ‘during the reduction period.’”
—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause.”

MR. ASQUITH said that, in view of the ruling which the Chairman had given, it appeared to him that the Amendment did not raise the point which the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to raise. The question did not arise until Clause 3, where they were to give to the term “new licence” in Clause 2 an extension of meaning which in itself the term did not convey, and which was only imported into it after they had assented to Clause 3 in some form or other. If he was right in that contention, the simple effect of carrying the Amendment would be that the local option provision of the clause would not apply to new licences in the old sense of the term—after the expiration of the reduction period. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not want that. Nobody wanted that. The point that the hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to raise was whether at the expiration of the reduction period the local option provisions of Clause 2 should apply to existing licences after the reduction had taken place. That was a question which could only be discussed on Clause 3, which was not relevant to Clause 2 at all, and was not even raised by the Amendment. The Amendment simply raised the question whether new licences in the strict, old, proper sense of the term should or should not be subject after the fourteen years to the operation of what was called local veto. He was very sorry he had unwittingly enlarged the area of the debate. He would have done better to have held his tongue, but he thought it was for the convenience of Members on both sides that he should indicate that the Government would make it perfectly clear by express terms that it had never been their intention that a bare majority should decide the question of the continuance of these existing licences after the expiration of the reduction period. They would be subject to the local option provisions. They would be new licences in the full sense of the term, so that the local veto on the proper requisition could be taken. But they never intended, and he believed no responsible statesman had ever proposed, an operation of that kind in regard to existing licences by a bare majority. The Amendment to Clause 2 would appear on the Paper to-morrow, and as the discussion of that subsection did not come on until Monday, there would be ample time to consider whether the language they put down in fact carried out their intentions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR expressed great regret that the right hon. Gentleman after the opportunity for meditation in the holidays, was not going to put down the Amendment making Clause 2 clear until to-morrow. It was perfectly true that every Minister in charge of the Bill must, in the face of discussion and criticism, make modifications in the Bill, and put down Amendments carrying out those modifications. As he understood, he was only going to put down an Amendment which made clear what had always been the intention of the Government, and it was rather hard that what the Government always intended should only be told to the country two or three days before it came on for discussion. This was not a conclusion forced upon the Government by adverse criticism. It was the original intention, and why on earth the Government could not make the original intention clear in their original draft the right hon. Gentlemen had explained. The speech he had just would be overridden by a minority in the county. Let the Prime Minister apply this principle all round. But the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to apply it to one case in a thousand which came before the House; and, therefore, the sooner they got rid of the confusion which might be created by the right hon. Gentleman's statement that they were acting in opposition to a democratic principle the better. They were really protesting on behalf of what they believed to be the freedom and liberties of the people of this country.

*MR. CAVE said he found it difficult to discuss either the clause or some of the Amendments without knowing what the Bill meant as a whole. He wished to discuss whether it was expedient that all existing licences should become new licences after fourteen years. If the clause meant only that no new licences, in the sense in which they now understood the term—that was to say, additional licences—should be granted after the passing of a prohibitory Resolution, it was really a small matter, because, as his noble friend had pointed out, there was already a prohibition in Clause 1 against granting those licences in excess of the scale. He appealed to the Government to say whether he was right in thinking that the effect of the clause would be that, after fourteen years, all existing licences could be suppressed by local veto. If that were so, the clause was open to objections which could not be stated too strongly, because, reading the two clauses together, they meant that, after fourteen years, the surviving licences, which would be presumably those most wanted and those which had paid the most money, might be wiped out by a bare majority of the inhabitants of the locality. There was some ambiguity in the Bill, and surely the Committee was entitled to know what was the meaning of the Government, and whether when they came to Clause 3, they were going to put in some provision that existing licences in their sense would not be affected by Clause 2. He hoped some response would be made to that appeal, as he found it difficult to give his opinion on the clause without having an answer to it. In the meantime, if they obtained an answer he should certainly vote against the clause, as he understood it, as introducing local veto with regard to existing as well as future licences.

MR. ASQUITH said the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, which was courteous, fair, and reasonable, illustrated the imprudence and inconvenience of discussing on Clause 2 anything more than Clause 2 itself. Clause 2 was confined to new licences, and all its provisions were confined to that, and it was not until they came to Clause 3 that Clause 2 had any effect upon existing licences. If he were, in response to his hon. friend's courteous appeal—and he must say something—to go into matters of detail as to what the Government would do when they reached the next clause, he would open the floodgates of discussion and upset the whole of the Resolution giving time for the discussion of the clauses, and debar the Committee from devoting the time allocated to Clause 2, in which there were important and practical considerations. As to the majority by which local option was to be voted, and the area within which it was to be voted, he would say at once—and he appealed to the House not to take advantage of it and widen the area of discussion—that when they came to Clause 3, the second subsection, he should certainly make it clear that it was not the intention of the Government that after the expiration of the fourteen years the existing licences should be got rid of by a bare majority, and in no Local Option Bill that he had ever known, dealing with existing licences put forward by a responsible Minister, had any such intention been expressed. To that extent he might reassure his hon. friend, but he deprecated discussion as to the effect of Clause 3 until that clause came before the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said his hon. friend appealed to the Government to make clear the scheme which they proposed in relation to Clause 2 and Clause 3, and he might be peculiarly unfortunate or peculiarly slow of apprehension, but he really was left in an absolute fog as to what the Government's intention was. He did not believe that any hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side had the smallest idea of what they should have some assurance that such a contingency should not arise.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) suggested that, in view of what the Prime Minister had said, the hon. Member would not only be fully justified in but fully desirous of moving his Amendment. Nothing could be clearer than that what was meant was that all licences were to go, and what the Government contemplated was merely a change of machinery. The answer given by the Prime Minister made it all the more necessary and important, as the Leader of the Opposition had said, that they should press the Amendment, because they were in ignorance of the real intention of the Government and of their policy. Personally, he had very little doubt as to the real meaning of that policy. The whole question of local veto was surely raised now in a stronger form than they could have anticipated, and it was therefore far more important now than it was before that the Amendment should be pressed. He only hoped that in the division the Amendment would be supported by a large number of Members opposite who were opposed to local veto as a matter of principle, and that they would thus take the opportunity of saying that the method of the Government was not a proper one.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hants, Basingstoke) said he found himself in a position of the greatest difficulty in regard to this clause and the Amendment which had been moved, and he felt convinced that that difficulty must be very largely shared not only by his own colleagues on that side of the House, but by hon. Members on the back benches opposite. He would look with the greatest interest to see not only how hon. Members opposite voted, but what they would say before the division took place, in regard to what he would venture to say was the extraordinary position in which the House of Commons found itself placed. The Committee were called upon to make up their minds upon the expediency or otherwise of a certain clause which was printed here, and they had to ask themselves before they passed that clause what its practical operation and real meaning would be. That clause, which was of the utmost moment, would have operation in this country during the reduction period. That they all understood, and the Amendment, if carried, would limit its operation to that period upon which light was thrown. Would it have operation after the expiration of the reduction period? At one time that was denied, but a question of great importance was asked by the hon. Member for Westmoreland, and it was answered, in his humble judgment, in the only way in which it could be answered, having regard to the terms of the Bill. If the matter stood there, they should know where they were, and they should know what the operation of the clause would be after the expiration of the reduction period. Whether they approved or disapproved they should be voting on that which they knew. They were now told that the clause would have some operation—and any operation it had would be of great importance and would affect the lives of many—but they were not told what the operation would be. That was left unknown. Hon. Gentlemen on the back benches opposite whose credit was involved at the present moment, were asked to vote in the dark for a clause the meaning of which the Committee did not know, on the faith and belief that the Government would so alter a subsequent clause that the meaning of the present clause would be found satisfactory. He appealed to Members of the Committee not to tolerate a proceeding to which no member of Parliament ought to consent, and to insist on not recording a vote on the merits of this clause until they were able to say to themselves that they knew what its practical operation in the country would be.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir EVANS, Glamorganshire, Mid.) said he thought that the clause was perfectly clear, irrespective of the application which might be given to it when they came to the subsequent clause in the Bill. The meaning of it was that with regard to new licences not merely for the fourteen years, but for all time, they could have local option by a bare majority. No licence was a term well understood. It had been used often. It had been used for Members who were enthusiastic in these matters to support them, but he asked the Committee not to jeopardise the main principle of the Bill, which was that the nation should get the control of this traffic. Once the nation had got that it could manage it as it chose. But it was almost a breach of faith to say that the nation should then be tied by these restrictions. All these matters of local veto and the like were matters for posterity. They had no right to meddle with posterity. It was because he wished to see the main principle passed into law that he opposed this clause.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) asked the Government whether he rightly interpreted the position as explained by the Prime Minister. As he understood it, the present view of the Government was that the local option proposals were not to operate in regard to the new licences under Clause 2. [Cries of "No."] That only showed how extremely important it was that there should be a clear statement. He confessed the construction he placed on the answer made by the right hon. Gentleman was that at the conclusion of the fourteen years reduction period it was not the intention of the Government that the licences, which became new under the extraordinary provisions of Clause 3, should be included under local option within the scope of Clause 2. Was he now to understand that the view of the right hon. Gentleman was identical with that expressed by the Under-Secretary in answer to a Question put by the hon. Member for Westmoreland in this House? The Question was—

The Under-Secretary to the Home Department made a short and lucid reply. He said "Yes." They were, therefore, face to face with the fact that the present proposals of Clause 2 were to apply to every licence in the country as soon as the fourteen years had expired.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that that question, which was a very proper one, would really arise on Clause 3.

MR. F. E. SMITH said in that case he would not continue to discuss the Amendment. The point of order would and must arise on the next Amendment on the Paper. He would, therefore, say nothing further, except that if they were to discuss to-day the question of whether or not they should agree to the proposals for local option, without in any way knowing the scope to be given to those proposals, a less profitable discussion could not be taken.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said he imagined from the Chairman's ruling that all these Amendments limiting reduction period would be out of order. He had one objection to local option that he had always had, and it was a matter of regret to him that he was opposed to his friends upon this matter. He was in favour of temperance and temperance legislation. He would like to see this traffic under the control of the State, and not in the hands in which it was at present. If this clause was to make local option unlimited he, with many of his friends, would have to vote against it. As he had said he understood these Amendments would be out of order.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think they are out of order. I am inclined to think that some of them are likely to bring up this question, but I do not think it arises properly on the Motion to leave out this subsection. If it arises at all it arises on the Amendment for the reduction of the period.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) appealed to the Prime Minister to give the Committee a clear statement as to the arrangement he had come to, and to let the Committee have a free and fair discussion upon it. Members had come down to the House prepared to discuss the whole question, but under the ruling of the Chairman had been restricted to a very small part of it, namely, the new licences to be granted during the reduction period. There might be a few such cases. If there were, why could not the Government leave the matter to the licensing justices? They had a knowledge of the district.

Anyone who had sat on a licensing bench knew the difficulty of getting a new licence. The Prime Minister said that on Clause 3 he would make certain proposals. He gathered those proposals would be to alter the majority. If the right hon. Gentleman altered the majority it would only come back to Clause 2. Clause 3 was going to rule all licences after the reduction period, and, therefore, it would be convenient for the House now to discuss Clause 2 as applicable to licences after the reduction period.

*THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member appears to be discussing that clause at large. If this question arises at all on this clause it will arise on the Amendment to insert the words "at any time during the reduction period."

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS expressed his fear that when Clause 3 came to be discussed the Committee would be told that Clause 2 had been passed, and that they could not go back to it.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.) said that as he happened to have upon the Paper an Amendment to omit this clause, he might be allowed the opportunity at this stage to address the Committee. He shared the embarrassment of hon. Members as to where they stood, and he would like to endeavour if possible correctly to interpret the somewhat oracular utterance of the Prime Minister. He gathered that the right hon. Gentleman wished the Committee to understand that while he had up his sleeve—to use a cant phrase—some modification of the clause, they must for the moment content themselves with discussing the point of what was erroneously called local option, but what was really local veto with regard to its operation in Clause 2 as it stood—in other words, in regard to its operation during the reduction period. He construed the Prime Minister's words in this way: "We have a very difficult Bill to pass through the House, and we have a very militant section of supporters whom it has been our custom to study. We have had to throw them this sop of local option, and by a stroke of ingenuity on the part of our draftsmen, we have given them something which appears to satisfy them, but which turns out to be nothing more than this: We have given you local option during a period in which there will be absolutely no new licences to vote against, and when the time comes for the old licences to become new licences we are going to take the local option from you by some method which it would not now be in order to discuss." He was in the House when the hon. Member for Westmoreland asked the question as to whether local option under this particular clause would prevail after the reduction period, and the Under-Secretary made the laconic answer "Yes." The right hon. Gentleman, the Prime Minister, with his legal mind, knew that when a clause of an Act of Parliament said that something which had been provided for should be subsequently enforced, it could only be enforced as might subsequently be determined by Parliament; it did not become operative until Parliament had again considered it. He understood the position to be this: Under the clause they were asked to say—and to this he particularly called the attention of the hon. Member for Westmoreland and the right hon. Member for Spen Valley—that if it were a question of any new licence about to be granted during the reduction period—a state of things which it was almost impossible to conceive—they were to get together a handful of parish voters, who might prevent the justices who were responsible from granting it. That was all they were doing at present. In contemplating the vote he should give on this point he would bear in mind the fact that possibly to-morrow the House might determine that, after the reduction period, existing licences should become new licences. That was the meaning of Clause 2. Therefore he must not vote for local option under Clause 2, without having present in his mind that local option might become operative and applicable, under some other clause, to all other licences to come. That being so, he went right back to first principles and asked himself what they were talking about, what local option meant, and especially what it meant under the provisions of this extraordinary Bill—this omnibus Bill. He would like to throw out this specific and definite challenge to any hon. Gentleman who supported the Bill.

Could he point to any place on the earth in which local option — as it was so erroneously called—had been in operation, where the total consumption of alcoholic drink had been lessened by 1d. in the course of the year. That was a fair test. [The Prime Minister here left the House.] He was sorry he had frightened the right hon. Gentleman away—[Laughter]—but he was happy to see present the right hon. Gentleman's able lieutenant, the right hon. Member for Spen Valley, who was the real author of this Bill. He asked this specific question—Where had local option done any good from the temperance point of view? They might point to one or two limited districts and say that by the artificial operation of this system in such a district, there was a less consumption in that particular piece of God's earth; but as against that, they had the fact that there was a great consumption in the district immediately adjoining, with infinitely intensified evils. [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] That being so, the first foundation of the proposal was gone. He took the phrase which was used on that side of the House, "local option"—but perhaps he used it with less of tongue in his cheek, if he might say so respectfully, than did the noble Lord opposite—and he would say that it was utterly opposed to every principle of democratic Government. They talked glibly about giving the people power to decide, but they did not give that power. First of all, they selected a carefully limited section of the community to decide the question; and, on that, let him remind hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House that where local option had been put in force the highest poll ever recorded did not exceed 33 per cent. of the parish electors. [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] The hon. Member said "No." He repeated that the highest poll ever recorded in favour of any local option resolutions, in any part of the world, did not exceed 33 per cent. and the average number of the votes did not much exceed 25 per cent. even of the limited electorate entitled to vote. Dealing strictly with the right of any section of the community to vote on the question of licences, he submitted that, on the point of principle, it was utterly opposed to every principle of representative Government. It related every representative of the people, whether municipal or parliamentary, to the position of a mere delegate—a position which he hoped no hon. friend near him was prepared to accept—at any rate in that House, whatever might be necessary in other congresses and associations. So much for the principle of the thing; but what about its effects? He happened to make an inquiry yesterday of a friend who lived very near to that earthly paradise, the Garden City of Letchworth. There there was no public-house, and he assumed that local veto in operation would have that effect, and he asked his friend what would be the effect on the Garden City. Might he ask the attention of the Committee to this letter which he had received, and which explained what followed the operation of local veto as contemplated by Section 1 of this clause? The letter said—

"The Garden City (two and a half miles from Hitchin) has a population, approximately, of 5,000 people—men, women and children. Of these about 2,000 would be working men. There are two licensed houses on the estate, which were in existence before the city was established. They are four miles apart, at opposite corners of the estate. There are no other facilities whatever for obtaining drink, as grocers and clubs are expressly barred from selling it. The consequence is that an enormous amount of secret drinking goes on in private houses. In fact, I have been told by several people who are in a position to know, and I have checked the statements by careful inquiries, that it is no uncommon thing for three or four 36-gallon casks of beer to be delivered a week at workmen's cottages. Of course, it is kept pretty quiet, or they would get into trouble with the Revenue officers. Then others, finding they have no facilities in the city, make a weekly pilgrimage on Saturday afternoons to Hitchin and Baldock (three miles away), and stop in the 'pubs' till the last train, at 10.30 p.m., to the Garden City. This train has got to be known as the 'drunkard's train,' so bad is the condition in which they get."

MR. BOTTOMLEY: Well, that was a direct result of the prohibition which existed in that place, and which would arise under local veto if it existed in this particular way. They were dealing here with one particular evil called the drink evil, and to test this principle of local veto he was entitled to say that if it were applied to the drink traffic it might legitimately be very simple one indeed. Clause 2 introduced certain local option proposals and the field upon which these proposals were to operate had been defined as new licences. But no new licences, or none of any account, could be granted at all. Therefore his hon. friends, assuming that this Clause 2 was not introduced merely for the purpose of providing the House of Commons with something to do, looked into the latter portion of the Bill to see if they could discover something to account for the importance which the Government attached to it, and in Clause 3 there was a definition given to "new licences," which extended the scope of Clause 2, hitherto inoperative, and made it very different indeed. Therefore they criticised the local option, not on the unreal or lesser operation of Clause 2, but on the mischievous field exposed by Clause 3. The Solicitor-General said that in construing the Bill they must in considering in Clause 2 what was the definition of a new licence in Clause 3, limit themselves to the definition given in Clause 2. When his hon. friend pointed out that it was a universal canon of construction of Acts of Parliament to take them as a whole, the Solicitor-General said an Act was not a Bill. That was a new and interesting canon of construction. His Parliamentary experience was a short one, but he was sure the Solicitor-General would never have drawn that distinction unless there were numerous and weighty precedents to support him. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would indicate what they were. The truth was that whether they were construing an Act or a Bill or any other document they construed it as a whole. Where did that carry them? It carried them to this point, that this apparently innocent scheme of local option was to operate not only on a few new licences, but on the whole of the licences which remained at the end of the fourteen years limit. That was the proposal with which they had to deal. Where was the hon. Gentleman on the benches opposite who had put down an Amendment similar to that moved by his hon. friend? What was his position? He had put his Amendment on the Paper, and explained that he thought that the Government were overloading the Bill, and that it was a mistake that the local option should cover the whole of the licences at the end of the fourteen years. The Prime Minister said it was intended to cover the whole of these licences, but instead of a bare majority a greater majority would be required. He supposed, under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman would vote with them in the lobby. What would the Amendment do if it were carried? There seemed to be some misunderstanding on the point. If this Amendment was carried it would make Clause 2 an honest clause, and make it impossible for that clause to do more than on its face it proposed to do. In the belief, which was not confined to one side of the House, that the extending of the principle of local option in Clauses 2 and 3, when read together, was mischievous in operation, and that it had never been considered by the Government, as had been shown by the introduction of an Amendment at the last moment, he would have no hesitation as to which way he should vote on this occasion.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER said his position was that he objected to local option or local veto as a permanent institution. The Liberal Party applied to the country on that issue in 1895, and were given a very distinct answer. He learnt a great deal about electioneering at that time, and he had since learnt a good deal about the feeling in the country on the subject of local veto. It had been recognised by temperance reformers that local veto was the wrong line on which to push forward temperance reform, and the right hon. Gentleman had in this Bill put temperance reform on other lines. The control of the drink traffic was to be in the hands of the nation. That being so, he applied to the Government to drop all minor issues which created opposition without advancing the cause of temperance. The Solicitor-General had inferred that it would be rather ridiculous to stop this curtailment at the end of fourteen years. But there was all the difference in the position before and after that period. During the fourteen years the control of the liquor traffic would be very much where it was at present. After fourteen years it would be in the

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said he had no personal knowledge of the Garden City of Letchworth, but he knew something of a somewhat similar experiment close to his own home in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, in the garden city established there by Mr. Cadbury, and he would be surprised if it were not the case that the people who were the first to take advantage of the opportunities afforded to them by garden cities were not men of a very high type of character and rather the pick of their class than a sample of the abounding population of a crowded industrial area. Therefore, it was extremely probable that all that the hon. Member had just said about the general character of the inhabitants was quite true, and that it was very unlikely that there should be in such a community, and under such circumstances, a special indulgence in drink which they did not find elsewhere. But the question raised was really wider than as regarded a particular garden city, and the dangers were much greater in other places than in garden cities. He remembered a description of the village at Bournville in one of the daily papers, and the fierce indignation of the inhabitants at its being supposed that they had ever been or were likely to be slum dwellers, or belonged to that class of the population. But when they applied the same kind of restriction, to which the picked inhabitants of these special cities willingly submitted, to the masses of the crowded quarters of our towns, would they not run a very great danger of promoting the kind of evils to which the hon. Member for South Hackney alluded? That was a serious question, because information supplied to him from more than one town led him to believe that there had been a tendency in recent years to form drinking clubs of a perfectly informal character in private houses. Bodies of men—not the best workmen, not characteristic workmen—who found difficulty in getting drink during prohibited hours on Sundays, subscribed sixpence apiece, bought a barrel of beer, and had it delivered to the house of one of them. They met on Sunday morning and sat there until the beer was consumed. He believed any attempt to enforce local veto in crowded populations was certain to lead to a tremendous development of secret drinking, which was infinitely more dangerous to the individual and to the community than any amount of regulated and public drinking. It was because he believed that any effort to impose upon a large number of people what, perhaps, a bare majority or a minority who went to the poll on a particular occasion chose to consider good for them, would lead to a great increase in secret drinking and all its abuses, that he was wholly opposed to giving such powers as were contemplated in this subsection.

Question put.

their intention was. [Ironical cries of "Hear, hear," from the LABOUR benches.] There might be some hon. Gentleman below the gangway who did understand what the intention of the Government was; they might be in their confidence, but he would mention an hon. Member who was not in their confidence. There was the hon. Member for Westmoreland, who had taken the keenest interest in this question for many years past, and whose honesty and ardour he respected, although he profoundly differed from his opinions. What had the hon. Gentleman said in the country? He said this meant a Local Veto Bill in the fullest sense of the word, because if Clauses 2 and 3 were taken together the only possible interpretation was that at the end of the time-limit every existing licence would be a new licence, and that all the provisions with regard to local veto would be applied. That was also the view of the Under-Secretary for the Home Department, but it now seemed that that was not the view of the Prime Minister, and they were left in absolute confusion as to what was the meaning of the Government by the two clauses taken in their logical and natural connection. He was anxious to follow the ruling of the Chair, and to abstain from discussing the broad question, but he must say if the Government did not put on their own Bill the interpretation which every other human being had put upon it, they ought to have placed on the Notice Paper the Amendments which were absolutely necessary, in order that the House might understand what the Government were driving at. He spoke in the presence of a large number of hon. Members opposite who differed from him, but who were equally anxious to know what interpretation the Government put on it. He objected to the Bill as drawn; they approved of it; but those who objected and those who approved were quite agreed as to what it meant. If he was right and the Government were going to withdraw from the Bill as it had been drawn, and to put an entirely new view as to what was to occur at the end of fourteen years, he thought it would be desirable in the interests of the debate that they should put on the Paper of the House those Amendments which, when introduced on Clause 3, would make clear what was now the utterly obscure and nebulous policy which they were recommending for their consideration. He could understand the Prime Minister's anxiety that this debate should not wander off into a discussion upon local option, but he must enter his most serious protest against the treatment the Government had meted out to the House in leaving them up to within a few hours of the discussion on Clause 3 in absolute ignorance of what it was that they meant. Without asking the Government to discuss or to defend any proposals which might be brought before the Committee to-morrow, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell the Committee what was the Amendment, which no doubt the right hon. Gentleman had in his portfolio, but which he had refused to put upon the Paper and which was so to alter Clause 3 that it would neither carry out the wishes of the hon. Member for Westmoreland nor the policy to which those who sat on the Opposition side of the House were and always had been opposed.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) thought this debate justified what he had ventured to say on the Second Reading of the Bill. A great mistake had been made in jumbling together a licensing and a temperance Bill. He said that as one who had advocated the main principle of this Bill for more years than most of the Members now supporting it. He felt very strongly indeed the absolute need of the essential principle of the Bill, which was that the nation should obtain the control of the drink traffic. He would have thought that was object enough. It was certainly sufficient to raise enough opposition and difficulty without putting into the Bill a number of temperance matters. He was not going to discuss them, but would merely say that this was not a proper temperance measure, and these matters ought not to have been put into it. A number of things had been put in, and he protested against them. As a supporter of the main principle of the Bill, he protested against "local option," "barmaids," and many other things being brought in. He opposed the whole of these things, because he believed they were unwise. It was all very well for Members who were enthusiastic in these matters to support them, but he asked the Committee not to jeopardise the main principle of the Bill, which was that the nation should get the control of this traffic. Once the nation had got that it could manage it as it chose. But it was almost a breach of faith to say that the nation should then be tied by these restrictions. All these matters of local veto and the like were matters for posterity. They had no right to meddle with posterity. It was because he wished to see the main principle passed into law that he opposed this clause.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) asked the Government whether he rightly interpreted the position as explained by the Prime Minister. As he understood it, the present view of the Government was that the local option proposals were not to operate in regard to the new licences under Clause 2. [Cries of "No."] That only showed how extremely important it was that there should be a clear statement. He confessed the construction he placed on the answer made by the right hon. Gentleman was that at the conclusion of the fourteen years reduction period it was not the intention of the Government that the licences, which became new under the extraordinary provisions of Clause 3, should be included under local option within the scope of Clause 2. Was he now to understand that the view of the right hon. Gentleman was identical with that expressed by the Under-Secretary in answer to a Question put by the hon. Member for Westmoreland in this House? The Question was—

The Under-Secretary to the Home Department made a short and lucid reply. He said "Yes." They were, therefore, face to face with the fact that the present proposals of Clause 2 were to apply to every licence in the country as soon as the fourteen years had expired.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that that question, which was a very proper one, would really arise on Clause 3.

MR. F. E. SMITH said in that case he would not continue to discuss the Amendment. The point of order would and must arise on the next Amendment on the Paper. He would, therefore, say nothing further, except that if they were to discuss to-day the question of whether or not they should agree to the proposals for local option, without in any way knowing the scope to be given to those proposals, a less profitable discussion could not be taken.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said he imagined from the Chairman's ruling that all these Amendments limiting reduction period would be out of order. He had one objection to local option that he had always had, and it was a matter of regret to him that he was opposed to his friends upon this matter. He was in favour of temperance and temperance legislation. He would like to see this traffic under the control of the State, and not in the hands in which it was at present. If this clause was to make local option unlimited he, with many of his friends, would have to vote against it. As he had said he understood these Amendments would be out of order.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think they are out of order. I am inclined to think that some of them are likely to bring up this question, but I do not think it arises properly on the Motion to leave out this subsection. If it arises at all it arises on the Amendment for the reduction of the period.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) appealed to the Prime Minister to give the Committee a clear statement as to the arrangement he had come to, and to let the Committee have a free and fair discussion upon it. Members had come down to the House prepared to discuss the whole question, but under the ruling of the Chairman had been restricted to a very small part of it, namely, the new licences to be granted during the reduction period. There might be a few such cases. If there were, why could not the Government leave the matter to the licensing justices? They had a knowledge of the district.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Cave and Mr. George Faber.

MR. F. E. SMITH moved to amend the clause by inserting after the first "resolution" the words "requiring or," in order that the inhabitants of a district might have the power to require the grant of new licences as well as the power to prohibit the issue of any such licences. The Amendment, he said, was one which he was very hopeful would commend itself to the Government. In the course of the debate several speakers had recommended the general tenour of this local option proposed, on the ground of its democratic character, and it was his good fortune to repair the omission of the Government responsible for it to enable them to carry out the democratic principle of the work begun in this section. His Amendment was necessary in order that the intention of the clause could be carried out. The principle of local option was that localities had the right to work out their own moral salvation. He would be glad to know why, if the people on the spot were the best judges whether they should not have a public-house, they were not also the best judges as to whether they should have one. Understanding the basic principle of the clause to be that the people on the spot were the best judges whether they should or should not have public-houses, he was anxious to hear the Government explain why the people were not the best judges whether they should have more licensed houses than existed in their locality. But the Government's answer must be a democratic one. He would have liked to ask the Labour Members, had they taken sufficient interest in the question to be present, whether their view of the democracy which they so specially represented was that it should be prevented from having additional public-houses if it thought proper. Was that the view of the Labour Party, and if so, why were they not present in larger numbers to support it?

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): They are here oftener than you are.

MR. F. E. SMITH said that perhaps they would hear some democratic explanation of that point. The question had been discussed by a very intelligent organ of Liberal opinion, the Manchester Guardian, and he would commend to hon. Gentlemen opposite its view as to what was democratic in this case—

"The only perfect solution or approach to a perfect solution is one that would give each and every area the right to be sober by its own will or intemperate by its own will. It is democratic; it concedes all that is reasonable in the views of the rather-see-England-free-than-England-sober party, and it minimises the obnoxious element present in nearly all legislation for improving other people's habits."

Coming from a Liberal organ, he received these expressions of opinion with very great pleasure. But they did not please the National Temperance Federation, whose secretary wrote to the paper a very warm remonstrance, describing its views as "grievously and sadly erroneous." He said in his letter—

"I have heard even eminent temperance advocates flatter their working-class hearers by telling them that hitherto the magistrates have been the licensing authorities, but that the temperance people desired to make the working-men magistrates in that respect, whereat their hearers cheered mightily. . . . The loose way in which this claim for a popular veto power was expressed has caused some public men who have come on our platforms, half-educated on the question, to assume that the temperance Bills, known as Permissive Bills, Local Option Bills and Local Veto Bills, are really Bills to enable the masses either to vote licences down or to multiply them by popular vote."

The Manchester Guardian, which was not accustomed to take things lying down, replied that—

"The basis of the case for local option is the belief—which is also the basis of Liberalism—that on the whole the ordinary man or community of men when given the control of their own concerns will seek after the better and shew the worse. Our correspondent's letter with its disbelief in the adequacy of any such popular tendency towards self-respect and decency, strikes us as a very good example of the attitude by which, more perhaps than by any other, temperance reform is delayed and discredited."

He hoped the Government would clearly explain to the House before this Amendment was disposed of whether they assented to the principle that the real reason for leaving these points to the working classes was that they knew their own needs and requirements better than the Government, and better than the Members of the House of Commons. If it was the case that the working classes were the best judges as to whether there was too many public-houses in a district, surely it could not be denied that they were also the best judges as to whether there was an insufficiency of public-houses. If that was the view of the Government then this Amendment ought to be carried. If it was not then the whole basic principle of local option disappeared, and it was nothing but a quack remedy.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 9, after the word 'and' to insert the words 'required' (Mr. F. E. Smith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASQUITH said that, if it were a matter of what he might call an abstraction of democratic policy, he thought there would be a great deal to be said for the view which the hon. Member had brought forward. As to the controversy between the Manchester Guardian and the Temperance Union, he would not say on which side his sympathies lay, but it seemed to him that the reasoning of the Manchester Guardian was cogent. The answer he had to give to the Amendment on behalf of the Government, and he believed the majority of the House, was that they were dealing with a serious practical question. In point of fact, nobody had asked for this addition to the machinery of local option. He had not heard of any part of the country which had come forward to complain that the existing licensing authorities did not give them a sufficient supply of facilities for the sale of intoxicating drink, and that it was necessary to egg them on with the stimulus of a local vote. He thought it could be only in possibly imaginary, and certainly very rare, cases that the community was unable, under the cumbrous machinery of the present law, to obtain a sufficient supply of public-houses. If that were so, it was unnecessary to encumber the Bill by an Amendment which, if it were carried, would involve a great deal of alteration of the latter part of the clause.

MR. F. E. SMITH said he had placed upon the Notice Paper eight or nine consequential Amendments.

MR. ASQUITH suggested that that circumstance was an additional reason for not accepting the Amendment which had just been moved, because it was likely to supply a fruitful field for further discussion. He thought the Committee would do well to adhere to the simplicity of the clause in its present form.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he had been somewhat entertained and surprised at the distinction which the Prime Minister had drawn between what he the other, because it was something which he never expected to hear from the bench opposite. Was it to be understood that there was no democratic abstraction at the root of local veto? He was not aware that anybody had alleged that the magistrates of this country had been over-ready to grant new licences; and, therefore, all this discussion depended, not upon a serious and practical question, but upon what the Prime Minister called a democratic abstraction. If that were so, let the abstraction have the one virtue which an abstraction could have by being complete, round, and logical. He thought hardships might arise in the application of local veto to the grant of new licences. For example, in the case of the construction of a new railway, a large body of navvies would be introduced into a district in which they would have no voting power in regard to the question whether the number of licensed houses was adequate. He should have thought that the best judges as to whether the accommodation was sufficient would have been the magistrates.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): The navvies supply themselves without the permission of the magistrates.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked, if that were so, what was the use of all this machinery. If liquor, instead of being obtained through the regular channel of the supervised public-house, was to be obtained through other channels which were not supervised, the Bill before them would not be worth the paper it was written on. He ventured to say that the whole of this scheme in Clause 2 was quite an unnecessary attribute to what the right hon. Gentleman called a democratic abstraction. If they were going to make sacrifices at that altar at least let the Government carry their principles to their logical conclusion, and not give a body—as he considered not qualified to deal with the matter at all—half the power and refuse to give the other half. He did not know whether his hon. and learned friend proposed to carry his Amendment to a division. Personally, he disliked the whole method adopted by the Government of dealing with this question, and therefore, he was not so anxious that it should be made either logical or coherent. The Amendment, however, did bring the clause within the rules of consistency and logic. It would appear from the proposal in the Bill that the Government did not consider the communities fit to deal with the question of drink facilities, for they were to be hampered by legislation to prevent the misuse of the power given. It seemed to him that the whole basis upon which the Government said they were dealing with licences was cut away from under their feet, and they were reduced to the melancholy position of the right hon. Gentleman putting practical necessities on one side as something not to be considered, and democratic abstractions on the other as things useless, unnecessary, and unworthy of the attention of a businesslike assembly.

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) appealed to the Prime Minister to accept this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman represented a Scottish constituency, to which this Bill did not apply, whilst on the other hand he (Mr. Lupton) represented a constituency to which this Bill did apply. There could not be a more ardent partisan supporter of the right hon. Gentleman than he was, for he had determined to live and die supporting the Party of which the right hon. Gentleman was the head. He had taken part in a good many hard fights, and he had always been victorious. The reason was that he had always chosen the ground on which he should fight so as to ensure that he had a good moral case. He believed that the democratic line of argument was a good one to run on, and a line on which they could win, but a fanatical teetotal line was not one on which they could win. If the Government contended that the magistrates were not competent to decide whether or not there should be new licences, and were going to grant local option, then let it be real according to the heading of Clause 2. If this Bill was going to permit the people in any locality to decide for themselves whether they would have one public-house, two or twenty, and whether they were to remain open on Sundays, and what hours they should open or close, then it would be a democratic Bill, and a thundering good Bill. By accepting this Amendment the responsibility would be thrown on the locality, and if it were accepted he would be able to reply to the electors who accused him of closing up the public-houses: "No, we are going to leave it to you to decide." One of the great evils of the present system was the wretched character of the public-houses due in a great measure to legislation and the action of the magistrates. It had been asked, if this clause did not operate for more than fourteen years, what was the use of it, because there would be very few licences granted. As far as Clause 1 was concerned, he contended that under it there might be a good many new public-houses created in both urban and rural districts, and also in districts where at present there was practically no population at all. It was a matter of the highest importance that the Government should proceed on a line that could be justified on the platform. If they took a line that could not be justified on the platform they would be deliberately riding for a fall. If there was no demand for a public-house, then this Amendment would be harmless; on the other hand, if there was a demand by an overwhelming majority why should they not have the public-house? He saw no reason why the people should not be trusted, because the more they trusted the people the better it was for them, as they rose to the dignity of the occasion. He did not desire to occupy the time of the House unnecessarily, but he wished to state to the Committee that he had seen what went on in other parts of the world; and the idea that they were going gradually to close all public-houses was altogether a delusion. The only chance was to reform public-houses, and they could only do that by placing the control entirely in the hands of the people who used them. If they were all opened up to broad daylight and if the ladies and gentlemen who went to these public-houses felt the responsibility for them they would keep them in order. They wanted an enlightened public opinion, and they could only get that by adopting a really sound local option. Surely the Prime Minister did not wish to lead them on to destruction, but was desirous of making a really sound Bill, which would be on permanent lines which no man could dispute. What was the use of passing a Bill which would be upset in three or four years time? If they did win it would be a great and glorious victory, and something of which politicians, temperance men, democrats and aristocrats alike might well be proud.

*MR. SUMMERBELL said it was not within his province to discuss the accusation which had been brought against the Labour Members in regard to non-attendance in the House, but he would say that the accusation was most unfair, for the members of the Party to which he belonged gave better attendance than many of those who sat above the gangway. If the hon. and learned Gentleman challenged that statement, he would produce proof. In regard to the matter under discussion he wished to say that in almost every industrial centre where the middle and upper classes lived, licensed houses were very scarce. That was due to the fact that the middle and upper classes had monopolised the licensing benches up to the present moment. It was on that account he rejoiced that they were going to have put into the hands of the people the power of saying how many licensed houses they would have in their midst. If the hon. and learned Member had adhered to that alone he would have considered that there was some justification for the Amendment. He believed in trusting the people to the fullest possible extent. He believed there was something in the argument that if the people were to be trusted in regard to the reducing of licences they should also be trusted in regard to the increasing of licences. He was glad to find so many enthusiasts on that side above the gangway in regard to trusting the people. If they were ready to trust the people in regard to the proposal in this Amendment he and his friends would ask them to trust the people in regard to a great many things, before long so far as legislation was concerned.

EARL WINTERTON said his hon. and learned ~~Member~~ was anxious to know what course hon. Members below the gangway proposed to take in regard to this Amendment. Would they support it as a democratic Amendment? The Prime Minister seemed to think that the suggestion of his hon. and learned friend was almost farcical, and he suggested that it was only brought forward for the purpose of causing diversion. What the Amendment proposed had already been adopted in some parts of the British Empire. It had been adopted in Victoria and South Australia. Section 27 of the Victoria Act of 1890 empowered the inhabitants to determine whether the number of victuallers' licences should be decreased or increased. That was exactly the principle which his hon. and learned friend had brought forward in the Amendment. The South Australian Local Option Act of 1880 provided that the people might vote for a reduction of licences, the retention of the existing level, or the granting of new licences. Therefore in both these cases democratic Governments trusted the people to say whether they would have fewer or more licences than they had. The right hon. Gentleman altogether misapprehended the position. He said that he never heard of any locality demanding more licences, and he challenged his hon. friend to bring forward a case. But he forgot that the position under the Bill would be entirely altered. He forgot that under the drastic proposals of the Bill a locality might consider itself aggrieved in not having a sufficient number of public-houses. He thought the pretence that this was a democratic measure had been demolished.

† *MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) said that when he heard the principle of local option and local veto assailed by Members opposite he felt that he must reply. He thought that the hon. Member who moved the Amendment had not explained to the Committee that what he was proposing was a revolution in the licensing system, and practically the abrogation of it, because the whole theory of our licensing system implied that the general law of the country was prohibition. The licensing system implied a general prohibitory rule for the whole country. The very title of Section 3 of the Act of 1872 was "Prohibition of the sale of Liquor without Licence." Prohibition had been the law of this country for the last 400 years. He was not surprised that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not shrink from revolution on this subject. They executed one revolution in 1904, and now they proposed a new revolution which practically abolished the licensing system. So long as the people of this country accepted the licensing system, which he thought all did, he held that local veto on the question whether there should be exceptions to the general rule was a necessary and essential part of any just licensing system. The whole theory of the system was that the general prohibition was subject to local exceptions granted to meet local needs by local magistrates. He and his friends contended that the people on the spot were better judges of the local needs than licensing justices. He had always felt that the licensing system could not logically be justified unless they took the vote of the people as to whether the general rule ought to be set aside. If the people refused to pass a prohibitory resolution and said: "We leave it to the justices; we do not interfere with the discretion of the licensing authority," then he and his friends were content to leave it to the justices to issue licences up to the statutory limit, to select the houses and the people who were to carry on the trade. But they claimed that they could not have a really logical system and justify the exceptions unless the people voted on the question, and therefore he thought the Government were eminently right in giving merely a prohibitory vote, and in not submitting the alternative question whether there should be free sale of liquor. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would propose the free sale of liquor he and his friends would have plenty of arguments against it. If they had a licensing system, local veto was logical, necessary, and just.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said the hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to put the temperance policy of the Government on a logical basis, and he must say that a more extraordinary speech he had seldom listened to. In order to justify the proposal of the Government and the attitude of the temperance associations with which he was connected he laid down that the whole basis of our licensing system was general prohibition subject to particular exceptions. He ventured to say that that was not historically true, and that it was practically nonsense. The progress of our licensing system was on a contrary principle. It started with free trade on which was gradually grafted increasing restrictions and regulations, but never from first to last had there been any historical foundation for the hon. Gentleman's argument that our system was based on universal prohibition. Was the Government's Bill based on that? It was quite true that no one might carry on the trade without a licence, and in order to hold a licence the licensee must fulfil certain requirements of the law. In order that a man might carry on practice as a doctor he had to fulfil certain qualifications, and they might as well say that our system of medical jurisprudence was based on general prohibition, subject to occasional exceptions; and equally in the case of solicitors, auctioneers, and barristers. The Bill did not contemplate anything like universal prohibition. It might contemplate prohibition in particular areas and circumstances, but quite clearly if the Government had they said: "We are not going to take away a single public-house. All we say is that you should have the power to reduce the number of public-houses if you wish it, and to increase the number of public-houses if you desire to do so." He recommended the hon. Gentleman to read Clause 1, which provided that the public-houses were to be reduced.

MR. LUPTON said he did not say that. He was not allowed in his speech to refer to the consequential Amendment which he had put down on the Paper, which said that, notwithstanding the scale in the First Schedule, there should be a regulating resolution which might be either prohibitory, or one imposing conditions, or one demanding one or more new licences with or without special conditions.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that the hon. Gentleman's speech to his constituents was quite inapplicable to the Government Bill, and to the clauses already passed. It referred to a state of things which the Government were not endeavouring to carry out, but which they were doing their best to resist.

MR. LUPTON said that the Amendment had the would get his beer just as easily as he did now. That was the class of argument that was used by hon. Members in the country; but when they got fierce temperance advocates like the hon. Member for Westmoreland they found that that hon. Member dwelt on the mandatory character of Clause 1 and the power of his constituents to reduce the public-houses still further without the power to increase them. It was now explained by another hon. Member that all that meant nothing, that it was not worth the paper it was written upon, and that if their constituents did not get beer in the public-houses they would get it elsewhere.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER said that the speech of the hon. Member for Westmoreland was one of the most interesting he had listened to in the House for a long time. The hon. Gentleman rushed in where his leaders feared to tread. For his part, he greatly respected the hon. Member for his courage, but he confessed he profoundly differed from the statement of the law on which the hon. Gentleman based his argument. The hon. Gentleman stated that the basis of our licensing law was prohibition. He ventured to say that the basis of our licensing law was not prohibition but regulation. It was impossible to read especially the earlier governing Acts, without seeing that, instead of its being the intention of Parliament to restrict, it was to provide, under regulation, but in ample measure, victualling houses for the people. If he went back to the Act of 1830 he found at the threshold of that measure, which was one of the most important of the licensing statutes, that it recited—

“It is expedient for the better supply of the public with beer in England to give greater facilities for the sale thereof than are at present provided.”

*MR. LEIF JONES asked the hon. and learned Member if the Beer Act of 1830 was not recognised at the time as an absolute change of the policy of the past, and was not the experiment a failure which had afterwards to be reversed?

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER admitted that that Act was found to work badly and was afterwards modified. But on the ground of a disputed fact, he differed profoundly from the hon. Member. However, if the hon. Member's statement of the law was accurate, it was not logical. They must trust the regulation of the trade either to the representatives of the people—the justices, or the people themselves. What was proposed in this Bill was wholly illogical, because they did not trust the one or the other. They trusted either to a certain extent. They trusted the justices to provide for a sufficient supply of drink to those who wanted it, but not for a sufficient reduction of the number of public-houses; and in the same way they did not trust the people wholly but only when the people agreed with what hon. Gentlemen opposite desired. If the majority agreed with them the wishes of the majority were to prevail, but if the majority wanted more public-houses then the opinion of the minority was to prevail. He felt confident that if local option or prohibition ever commended itself to the people of this country it would be on the lines that existed in our democratic Colonies.

SIR C. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) said that an hon. Member had said that magistrates had never forced licences on an unwilling district; but if he read the newspapers he would have found that in thousands of cases the licensing justices had often inflicted public-houses on districts which had been determinedly opposed to them.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

*MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe) moved to insert after the word "prohibiting" the words "the removal of any licence into such district or." The object of the Amendment was to carry out, as he believed, the intentions of the Government, and to do so without some of the incidental disadvantages which accrued from the way which the Government proposed. He ventured to hope that this was an Amendment which the Government might accept, because it was certainly one of the class that the Prime Minister, over and over again, had stated that the Government would be willing to accept; that was to say, it was a proposal which was loyal to the principles of the Bill, and was free from some disadvantages such as the Government Bill had. The objects of the Bill were to reduce licences to the scheduled number, by giving the inhabitants of licensing areas power to prevent an increase in the number of licences, and also to make the publican, at the end of the reduction period, pay the monopoly value. The object of the Government was not incidentally in carrying out these objects, to make a publican pay compensation value unnecessarily within the reduction period. In order to give the inhabitants of a district power to carry that out, it was clear they must have the possibility of prohibiting the grant of new licences in their district, and also of preventing the removal of a licence from one ward of a borough into another ward, because, as far as the inhabitants of a licensing district were concerned, it was the same thing if the number of licences was increased by the removal of a licence or by a new licence. The Government prohibited the removal of licences at all, and they altered the existing law. Under that law licences could be removed from one ward of a borough to another. The Government prohibited that by subsequent clauses altogether, and the result was that, supposing they had in a borough a number of wards, if in one of those wards the schedule required reduction in the number of licences, and in another the number of licences was not up to the schedule number, it was quite reasonable, there being no prohibitory resolution in force, if in the opinion of the justices there should be an additional licence in that ward, that they should be able to say to the publican: "Your licence has got to be put an end to, but if you go to the end of the street, you would be getting practically the same clientele and carrying on the same business, and you had better remove there, and have a new licence and not pay monopoly value for fourteen years." But they could not do that under the Government scheme—they could not do that unless they made him pay the monopoly value, although they did this next year or any year during the fourteen years. That was a result which was not necessary to the object which the Government had in view, and it appeared to him that it was inflicting upon publicans an unnecessary hardship, because the Government scheme could be perfectly well-carried out by accepting his Amendment. Of course, the difficulty arose largely from the fact that they had different areas for licensing and for the local veto resolution. He thought that everybody agreed that if they were going to have local veto it must be in small areas. The smaller the area the more reasonable it became, so under the Bill they had a different area for local veto and for the jurisdiction of the licensing justices. Under those circumstances, he submitted that putting forward as he did an Amendment loyal to the principle of the Bill, and carrying out its principle in every respect in the way in which the Government desired, and avoiding an incidental injustice to those engaged in the licensing trade, it was an Amendment which might be accepted by the Government. He therefore begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 9, after the word 'prohibiting,' to insert the words 'the removal of any licence in such district or.'"—(Mr. Herbert.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR S. EVANS said that, speaking generally, the policy of the Government Bill was to do away with the removal of licences, and they were there to give local option by way of prohibition. It would therefore be convenient to discuss the matter generally as to the removal of licences, and, speaking in that sense, he perhaps might give the House his experience that it had been attended with very considerable danger to the community. What they had very often was an application for a new licence in a particular district, to a particular bench of magistrates, and, as a sort of bait for the granting of such a new licence, the applicant came and said: "I do not ask for a new licence de novo; I ask for a removal from a place in the same licensing district." The difficulty was this, that as soon as they got their district they had their public-houses for it. If the licence was necessary, it should be granted for that district; if it was not, it ought not to be granted by removal from another. He suggested that, having made a very fair speech, his hon. friend might now drop the subject, in order that he might deal with it formally later on.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) thought the Solicitor-General had overlooked the fact that great convenience very often arose through allowing licences to stand. The hon. and learned Gentleman must know of many cases where, owing to the growth of building in one part of a district at a greater rate than in another, or to the construction of a railway station or some other development, need arose for a licensed house at a particular spot where one had not previously stood. Over and over again, difficulties were removed and things made to work smoothly by the removal of a licence from one house to another. Clause 22, if passed, would stop all that. It would prevent the justices really considering the needs of the district, for which they were responsible in licensing matters, and would lead to the maintenance of houses no longer required but which would be retained because of the inability to remove the licence to a district where it was required. The hon. and learned Gentleman must have also overlooked the fact that, from the point of view of compensation, Clause 22 would be a very bad thing indeed. If Clause 22 when reached was struck out of the Bill, and some such an Amendment as the one before the House inserted to enable the people to remove a licence from a district where it was no longer required to a locality where it was needed, a great deal of money in the shape of compensation would be saved. He strongly urged the Committee to consider these points before they finally rejected this Amendment.

MR. GRETTON (Rutland) was of opinion that the House did not quite realise what the Bill proposed to do. As he understood it, the Amendment, if passed, would not only prevent the licensing justices moving a licence from one district to another, but from moving it to another place in the same district. It would prevent them removing a licence from one house to another in the same street, or to a better site within a few yards of the old house. Before the Committee voted on this Amendment they should understand that a prohibition of removal went a great deal further than the hon. Gentleman proposed it should go by his Amendment. He understood that the Government was opposed to all removals; this proposal would prevent the removal of a licence already in existence to a more convenient site, even to next door, and therefore he earnestly suggested to hon. Members opposite that they should give the matter a little more consideration before deciding this question.

MR. PATRICK WHITE (Meath, N.) pointed out that what the Committee was asked to do was to say that instead of extinguishing a licence it should be possible to remove it from a district where it was no longer required to one where it was needed. If the right hon. Gentleman really desired to carry out the intentions of the Bill, he should certainly consider that point.

Question put, and negatived.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER said the Amendment he now had the honour to move must be read in conjunction with one lower down on the Paper. The effect would be to restrict the popular veto to saying there should be no increase on the present number, and it would not give them the power which this Bill undoubtedly would of shutting up existing public-houses. There were very cogent reasons to be urged in support of this Amendment. During the reduction period the operation of Clause 2 would not be very important, but during that time it would have one unfortunate operation. There was a transaction very common at the present time at Licensing Sessions which was most convenient. It was a transaction whereby an old-fashioned, ill-placed, and ill-fitted public-house was shut up on condition that a licence should be granted to a new house. If this Amendment were rejected it would not be possible during the reduction period for the justices to sanction an arrangement of that kind, because it would be granting a new licence. The result, if the Amendment were accepted, would be that during the reduction period a large number of old and ill-found houses, which would be much better out of the way, would be kept alive because the justices would feel the hardship of sweeping them out of existence. In the interests of temperance and good order this Amendment was deserving of attention. When they came to the period after the reduction period, this clause would have a very wide effect. By the operation of some majority which was to exceed the bare majority the people would have the power of shutting up every public-house. In any area they could pass a resolution the effect of which would be that at the expiration of the period of the current licences every public house and every hotel must close its doors unless the licensing commission were kept on for the purpose of granting licences. Parliament ought to hesitate before they put it into the power of the majority taken on a popular vote to shut up every house of public entertainment in any area. Local option had always been a failure. He also felt very strongly on the point taken by the hon. Member for Bolton. They ought to hesitate before legislating for posterity. They were now going to legislate so that at the end of fourteen years this enormous power was to be the subject of a popular vote. Such an important matter as that should not be legislated for now. It should be left to those responsible for dealing with it when the time came. This Amendment did no more than carry out the original intentions of the Government, and he thought that they never had any intention of giving to popular veto power beyond that of saying that after a certain number there should be no more new licences.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 9, to leave out the words 'the grant of new licences,' and to insert the words 'any increase in the existing number of licences.'"—(Mr. Clavell Salter.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the grant of new' stand part of the Clause."

SIR S. EVANS said that, so far as the object of the Amendment was to clear out undesirable houses, the Government hoped that they would be done away with almost entirely by the procedure of reduction in the fourteen years. But it ran entirely counter to the plan of the Government to allow the magistrates to grant any new licences at all if a prohibitory resolution had been passed. He could quite conceive that it would be most unsatisfactory, in the view of those who passed a prohibitory resolution, that a small house should be put on one side and what was called a gin palace substituted for it. Such a change might be most objectionable to a neighbourhood. Under these circumstances, they would follow the clause as it stood, so that after the passing of a prohibitory resolution a big licensed house could not be put in the place of smaller ones, for a big house might be much more objectionable to a locality than the smaller ones.

MR. COURTHOPE said he gathered that the expectation which was placed before them was that the result of his hon. and learned friend's Amendment would be that gin palaces would be set up in the place of respectable houses, but surely such cases were likely to be very few and far between. He was certain it would be admitted that the great majority of licensing justices honestly tried to do the best they could for their neighbourhoods, and they welcomed the opportunity whenever they got it, not of setting up gin palaces, but of setting up decent commercial houses, where food could be obtained and consumed in comfort, and not in unfit places, or hovels, such as existed in many parts of the country. If the Government insisted on this clause remaining in its present form they would be absolutely checking the work of one of the greatest temperance agencies that they had at the present time, viz., the work of the public-house trusts and of the refreshment-houses associations, and so forth. If the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend were adopted it would give power to those bodies to continue their excellent work. It would enable the justices to substitute a house for one or two, or even three, inefficient and insufficient houses, as the case might be. He had no hesitation in saying that in refusing an Amendment of this kind the Government were not doing anything for temperance; on the contrary, they were striking a blow at the progress of the temperance movement. He hoped that even now, at the eleventh hour, the Solicitor-General would see his way to changing his mind and accepting the Amendment.

MR. LANE-FOX said the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor-General must recognise the very large number of cases in which the public-house trusts had been able to do a great deal of good by paying the surrender value of badly-ventilated and ill-constructed houses, and setting up in their places useful and desirable refreshment places. The Bill, as drawn, made that in future impossible.

The Solicitor-General must know that in a great many cases, in small market towns, there were a large number of old-fashioned houses which were certainly unsuited to the requirements of the present day, and which could be very easily altered and put into better form. It would be absolutely impossible with the Bill as it stood for buildings of that sort to be erected. He could not expect the Government to accept the Amendment, because, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had said, it was contrary to the principles they had announced to the House, and it would make it impossible for the operation contemplated under the next clause to come into effect. Before they finally dismissed the Amendment, however, he wished to ask what justification the House had for rejecting it. What mandate had the House for saddling upon the country a system under which the prohibitory resolutions could be passed by which absolutely all the public-houses in a place could be taken away, it might not be by a bare majority, but by whatever majority the Government pleased? What hon. Member would dare to go before his constituents and say he was prepared to support a measure of total prohibition of that sort? The speech of the Solicitor-General showed that the Government were just as unwilling to trust the magistrates as in another direction they were unwilling to trust the people, and he thought it only right that the country should be made to realise the direction in which the Bill was going.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he should have thought the Government would have taken up a totally different attitude with regard to this Amendment from that they had adopted as expressed by the Solicitor-General, but they had shown themselves absolutely deaf to appeals made to them in the interests of temperance reform upon a basis far more likely to be permanent and to work beneficially in the hands of the people than any of the rather crude prohibitory methods which at present found favour on the Treasury Bench. The principle of the Government Bill was that, when there had been a resolution against a new licence, the resolution should be interpreted to mean actually not that the number of licences should not be increased, but that there should not in the technical sense be a new licence. That was not the form in which the people of the locality would really give the vote. Nobody would contend that if they had a vote in any of the localities, the people would be thinking of the quality of the public-houses or of the technical grant of a new licence. They would be thinking of the total number of public-houses, and what they would be voting for, and what everybody knew they would be voting for, would be that the number of public-houses should not be increased. His hon. friend suggested that they might concede the real principle the Government had in view, and that they might give to the locality an absolute discretion as to the number of licences, but that they should allow some latitude as to the quality of the licences granted. The hon. and learned Gentleman got up and said that if they did that they might see a gin palace substituted for a good and reputable, although a small, public-house. The hon. and learned Gentleman knew perfectly well that that was not what would happen under the Bill. It was neither the intention of the mover of the Amendment, nor was it what was going to happen in any circumstances. What was going to happen was that agencies which were now moving in the direction of true temperance reform, and were striving to the best of their ability to raise the character of public-houses, would receive a serious blow, deliberately dealt by a Government which professed to have the temperance cause at heart. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not made the smallest answer to the arguments of his hon. friend. The case put was this: If a locality decided that there should be no new licence, what they really meant, and what was always meant, was that there should be no increase in the number of licences; but the Bill made it impossible for any proposal to be made to improve the quality. He thought it was remarkable that a Government which claimed to be promoting temperance legislation should seriously defend a policy of that kind. If the Prime Minister were present to listen to the arguments addressed from that side of the House, he did not think the Government would be able to adhere to their decision; but he supposed in the present condition of the benches the members of the Government in charge of the Bill were absolved from answering to those arguments, and in those circumstances he did not think his hon. friend had much chance of carrying his Amendment. By the rejection of the Amendment, the Government were dealing a serious blow at one of the great agencies in favour of temperance, and they were doing that for no object whatever except to maintain the verbal integrity of the Bill they had thrown upon the Table of the House.

SIR S. EVANS said they differed from the view of the right hon. Gentleman and thought he was mistaken as he thought they were mistaken. He could only assure him that even if the Prime Minister were present the answer of the Government would be the same. The Government had no notion at all of preventing the improvement of public-houses. It could be effected by the justices now. The right hon. Gentleman said that what people would vote upon was whether there should be an increase in the number of the public-houses in a locality. What he (the hon. Member speaking) said and what he repeated was that what they would vote against was there being any new licence at all. He therefore differed from the right hon. Gentleman in that matter, and he did not say that where a gin palace was substituted for a small house or two small houses it often happened that they had much more facilities for ordinary drinking, because in the old houses they had more room adapted for recreation than in the new house. If the old licence ought not to exist, they hoped it would be done away with; but there was no reason why, if they gave the locality the right to pass prohibitory resolutions they should create a new licence in a different spot.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs) said that as a matter of fact licensing magistrates made it extremely difficult to improve houses in the direction in which they ought to be improved. The hon. Gentleman in his first speech had given what he thought was a very extreme case. It might have been one in his own private practice in which he succeeded in getting a gin palace erected somewhere or other instead of two small licences which were given away for it. If he succeeded in doing so he was to be congratulated on his success, because licensing benches in Scotland, and he believed in England, looked very narrowly indeed at proposals of this kind, and never granted new licences of that sort in return for a surrender unless they were perfectly satisfied that it would be an improvement on the existing condition of things, and that it was a public necessity, and would, to some extent, increase the accommodation in that locality. Why the Government should cut away the power of the licensing magistrates and reduce them to a position of complete nullity in administering the licensing laws it was difficult to say. They spoke with two voices. At one time they did one thing and at another time another. If there was one thing more patent than another it was that this Bill from beginning to end was a hotch-potch. There had been lots of cooks in the preparation of the Bill, and the result had not been particularly successful. Already the Prime Minister had said he required to-morrow to make Clause 3 read with Clause 2. He supposed Clause 2 was drawn by some people and Clause 3 by others. But be that as it might the whole thing was a complete muddle, and before they got to the end of the Bill, goodness knew what would happen to it. Meantime it was impossible, he supposed, to expect that any reasonable Amendment of this kind would be accepted. Having regard to the fact that it was to have such a wide operation at the end of the time-limit period it seemed certainly not very judicious to leave it in its present unsatisfactory position.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Salter and Mr. Lane-Fox.

*MR. LEIF JONES moved an Amendment substituting the rural parish or urban area within a licensing district for the licensing district as the area in which local option might be exercised. He said the Amendment would make a change in the area over which the local option poll would

Clause 2 unless good reason was shown to the contrary, they should keep to the area which had already been decided upon as the reduction area in Clause 1. Another very great reason for the change which he proposed was that the licensing district in the rural areas were very much too large for the purpose on poll in regard to new ding to the statistics a Blue-book on licensing using district, apart from ged about 20,000 popula- rea of 40,000 acres, but were very much larger tion and area. For in- rn constituency of North the east ward had an acres, and the west ward In some licensing districts attered population with venty, and even thirty ith regard to new licences , irrational to poll villages miles off on the question there should be a new in a village with which tically nothing to do. village at the extremity district would not under- / should be called upon licensing problem of a village ten or twenty miles away at the other extremity. There were licensing districts in the neighbourhood of big towns which had an enormous population. Take, for example, the Beacontree Division of Essex, which had a population of 285,892. He had in his possession a list of nineteen or twenty of those large licensing districts with a population of over 75,000. The Edmonton Division had a population of 241,504; Willesden, 182,364; Glamorgan, 159,851; and the Manchester Petty Sessional Division, 163,256. It was obvious that to poll all these people on the question of a new licence at the other end of the division, with which they were very little concerned, was quite an unnecessary process if they accepted the position he took up, namely, that a licence was a matter of local concern affecting only the immediate neighbourhood which it was proposed to serve. His Amendment was of first importance in the case of districts just outside great towns. The Brentford Petty Sessional Division of Middlesex had a total population of 124,000, and some of the parishes embraced in that area were growing whilst others were stationary. Take, for example, Ealing, which in 1901 had a population of 33,031, and an estimated population in 1904 of 39,920; Twickenham, 20,991 in 1901, and an estimated population in 1904 of 24,500. Those were growing districts in the neighbourhood of London to which working men went to escape from public-houses, and it was essential if this clause was going to be any use at all in such districts that his Amendment should be accepted. In the case of Ealing and Twickenham it would be quite sufficient to let the people of those parishes vote in this matter themselves, and not call in places ten or twenty miles away. He wished to point out how the decision in regard to Clause 1 would affect the smaller districts. In most of the parishes of the country there could not be any new licences. In the county of Cumberland, where there were 206 civil parishes, there were only fifty-three in which there could be a new licence under the Bill, because the scale of licences fixed already settled that the other 153 were fully supplied. In the Penrith licensing district, which contained thirty-eight civil parishes, the question of a new licence could only arise in eight parishes, because thirty of those parishes were already fully supplied, according to the scale of the Bill. Some of the villages were thirty miles apart, and it seemed altogether to defeat the intention of the Government to allow those scattered villages to vote on questions which scarcely concerned them at all. When the late Sir William Harcourt introduced his Bill on this question in 1895, the area chosen by him was practically the same as he was now proposing. Some parishes would probably be too small for that purpose. There were 4,654 parishes with a population of less than 200, and he had figures dealing with those of less than 100, and between 50 and 100, and he quite recognised that it might be desirable to group some of these parishes. Another important point was that the area decided upon now would become the area at the end of the time limit. He had heard the argument used against local veto in this House, that they were likely sometimes to enforce it upon an unwilling population. He could understand that situation arising if they took a very large area. Most of what hon. Members opposite called the fallacies of prohibition very largely arose from the attempt to group together different areas with the result that they might have a large rural population enforcing upon a small urban area a condition of things which the urban area did not desire. That was the experience in the United States in places to which hon. Members had already referred. He agreed that this kind of legislation could not be effective unless they had a strong popular opinion behind it. Reference had already been made to the Blue-book issued by the Foreign Office on the experience of local option in the United States, and this emphasised the importance of having behind local option the influence of the local population. That Report said—the Amendment which his hon. friends desired to move to increase the areas. He was not certain whether the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield could be brought on at a later stage, and on the point of order he asked the ruling of the Chairman.

“The tendency of legislation is now to make the unit smaller and smaller. It is endeavoured to ensure that the same public opinion which enacts a law shall also supervise its enforcement.”

On grounds of local convenience, as well as the experience of other countries, it was desirable they should choose the smaller area rather than the larger one.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CALDWELL): I will look into it before we reach it.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that as the Amendment now before the Committee put the question in a way which enabled them to discuss it, he thought they should thoroughly discuss it now rather than take the chance of discussing it on an Amendment which was to come on later and which might be ruled out of order.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The Amendment would be in order.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I thought so. I think that any decision taken on this Amendment would not rule out the Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for Sheffield. So far as this Amendment is concerned I am certain that hon. Gentlemen behind me will oppose the smaller areas, for we are certain that they would not be in the interest of administration or temperance.

EARL WINTERTON said he understood the Deputy-Chairman to rule that if this Amendment was accepted by the House, the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield would not be in order.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I said the very reverse.

SIR SAMUEL EVANS: On the point of order, perhaps it would be better to let that matter stand until we reach the Amendment.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I would point out that if we were to wait to a

later stage, we might be cut out of the opportunity for discussion altogether.]

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I think it is inconvenient to give a ruling on the point just now. Hon. Members know that there may be another in the Chair when the Amendment is reached. It is more convenient that the Chairman who is in the Chair when the Amendment is reached should give the ruling.

MR. YOUNGER: May I point out that if the words of the hon. Member's Amendment are put in the Bill restricting the areas, words increasing the areas cannot be moved.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That is the point I have stated. We will deal with the Amendment when it is reached.

EARL WINTERTON: I did not gather, if I may say so, that the decision which has been come to is the decision of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman made use of the pronoun "I" in the course of his speech, and I gathered that he had come to this decision almost on the spur of the moment.

MR. L. HARCOURT: Perhaps it will be for the convenience of the Committee if I tell them that the noble Lord is mistaken.

EARL WINTERTON said he regretted that he had formed a wrong impression. Certainly any impartial listener to the speech would have come to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind on the spur of the moment to accept the Amendment. The light-hearted way in which the right hon. Gentleman accepted the Amendment showed that the Government could have given little consideration to the matter. It was a matter of first-rate importance, and under the decision which the Government had come to a most ridiculous state of affairs arose. There were parishes in England which had only a small number of inhabitants, and under the Amendment the area for exercising local option would be the parish. He did not think that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite really realised the effect the Amendment would have in small parishes. There were parishes six or seven miles long and barely a mile broad, and the effect of the Amendment would be that a man living in the middle would only have to go half a mile north or south to get into an area where there was no local option. To carry out the hon. Gentleman's suggestion logically, it would be necessary to have some kind of gendarmie to prevent people from going out of one parish into another. He appealed to the Committee before passing this Amendment to consider the ludicrous position the country would be placed in if the parish area were adopted.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said that morally, if not technically, it would be impossible hereafter to discuss any enlarging Amendment if this one were decided in the affirmative. It was necessary now to say how much they on that side of the House regretted the decision of the right hon. Gentleman. By accepting the Amendment, as they thought with such levity, the right hon. Gentleman had totally ignored the dignity, independence, and the right to be treated as efficient self-governing communities of all the great boroughs of the country. The effect of the Amendment was to make local option between ward and ward in all the great boroughs. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to leave to these great boroughs the option of saying for themselves in what way they would regulate this great and important matter in their own areas.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said he objected entirely to these small areas. By an Amendment which he had on the Paper he proposed that the area should be that of Quarter Sessions or boroughs with over 25,000 inhabitants. Areas of that kind, he thought, would be much more suitable than the licensing districts which the Government proposed. But by the Amendment which the Government had accepted the licensing districts were going to be split up into small areas quite unsuitable for the purpose intended. The border difficulty was a real difficulty, and one which was fully appreciated by the right hon. Member for Spen Valley when he waited on the Prime Minister last year. The right hon. Gentleman appreciated the difficulty in regard to Sunday closing, and the same argument exactly applied to local veto. The report of the deputation which waited last December on the present Prime Minister, stated that the right hon. the Member for Spen Valley—

The Prime Minister asked: “Why should it not be left to localities?” to which the right hon. the Member for Spen Valley replied: “Because the difficulty of drawing a border-line is enormous.” What border-line was he and the hon. Member for Appleby going to draw now? The right hon. Gentleman continued—

The area was now to be the ward. It might be a ward densely populated, close together, in a small area in which the division went down the middle of the street, so that there was a border difficulty even as the clause now stood. He was afraid under the procedure that night they would not have an opportunity of discussing this question properly. They who represented county boroughs entirely objected even to wards being made the districts for polling on this important question. He was afraid it was almost too late to ask the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider his decision. It was hardly treating the House fairly for the right hon. Gentleman to accept an Amendment from a prominent Member of his own party on an important question of this kind. The Government ought to have considered it when they were framing their Bill. Representatives removed and things made to work smoothly by the removal of a licence from one house to another. Clause 22, if passed, would stop all that. It would prevent the justices really considering the needs of the district, for which they were responsible in licensing matters, and would lead to the maintenance of houses no longer required but which would be retained because of the inability to remove the licence to a district where it was required. The hon. and learned Gentleman must have also overlooked the fact that, from the point of view of compensation, Clause 22 would be a very bad thing indeed. If Clause 22 when reached was struck out of the Bill, and some such an Amendment as the one before the House inserted to enable the people to remove a licence from a district where it was no longer required to a locality where it was needed, a great deal of money in the shape of compensation would be saved. He strongly urged the Committee to consider these points before they finally rejected this Amendment.

MR. GRETTON (Rutland) was of opinion that the House did not quite realise what the Bill proposed to do. As he understood it, the Amendment, if passed, would not only prevent the licensing justices moving a licence from one district to another, but from moving it to another place in the same district. It would prevent them removing a licence from one house to another in the same street, or to a better site within a few yards of the old house. Before the Committee voted on this Amendment they should understand that a prohibition of removal went a great deal further than the hon. Gentleman proposed it should go by his Amendment. He understood that the Government was opposed to all removals; this proposal would prevent the removal of a licence already in existence to a more convenient site, even to next door, and therefore he earnestly suggested to hon. Members opposite that they should give the matter a little more consideration before deciding this question.

MR. PATRICK WHITE (Meath, N.) pointed out that what the Committee was asked to do was to say that instead of extinguishing a licence it should be possible to remove it from a district where it was no longer required to one where it was needed. If the right hon. Gentleman really desired to carry out the intentions of the Bill, he should certainly consider that point.

Question put, and negatived.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER said the Amendment he now had the honour to move must be read in conjunction with one lower down on the Paper. The effect would be to restrict the popular veto to saying there should be no increase on the present number, and it would not give them the power which this Bill undoubtedly would of shutting up existing public-houses. There were very cogent reasons to be urged in support of this Amendment. During the reduction period the operation of Clause 2 would not be very important, but during that time it would have one unfortunate operation. There was a transaction very common at the present time at Licensing Sessions which was most convenient. It was a transaction whereby an old-fashioned, ill-placed, and ill-fitted public-house was shut up on condition that a licence should be granted to a new house. If this Amendment were rejected it would not be possible during the reduction period for the justices to sanction an arrangement of that kind, because it would be granting a new licence. The result, if the Amendment were accepted, would be that during the reduction period a large number of old and ill-found houses, which would be much better out of the way, would be kept alive because the justices would feel the hardship of sweeping them out of existence. In the interests of temperance and good order this Amendment was deserving of attention. When they came to the period after the reduction period, this clause would have a very wide effect. By the operation of some majority which was to exceed the bare majority the people would have the power of shutting up every public-house. In any area they could pass a resolution the effect of which would be that at the expiration of the period of the current licences every public-house and every hotel must close its doors unless the licensing commission were kept on for the purpose of granting licences. Parliament ought to hesitate before they put it into the power of the majority taken on a popular vote to shut up every house of public entertainment in any area. Local option had always been a failure. He also felt very strongly on the point taken by the hon. Member for Bolton. They ought to hesitate before legislating for posterity. They were now going to legislate so that at the end of fourteen years this enormous power was to be the subject of a popular vote. Such an important matter as that should not be legislated for now. It should be left to those responsible for dealing with it when the time came. This Amendment did no more than carry out the original intentions of the Government, and he thought that they never had any intention of giving to popular veto power beyond that of saying that after a certain number there should be no more new licences.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 9, to leave out the words 'the grant of new licences,' and to insert the words 'any increase in the existing number of licences.'"—(Mr. Clavell Salter.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the grant of new' stand part of the Clause."

SIR S. EVANS said that, so far as the object of the Amendment was to clear out undesirable houses, the Government hoped that they would be done away with almost entirely by the procedure of reduction in the fourteen years. But it ran entirely counter to the plan of the Government to allow the magistrates to grant any new licences at all if a prohibitory resolution had been passed. He could quite conceive that it would be most unsatisfactory, in the view of those who passed a prohibitory resolution, that a small house should be put on one side and what was called a gin palace substituted for it. Such a change might be most objectionable to a neighbourhood. Under these circumstances, they would follow the clause as it stood, so that after the passing of a prohibitory resolution a big licensed house could not be put in the place of smaller ones, for a big house might be much more objectionable to a locality than the smaller ones.

MR. COURTHOPE said he gathered that the expectation which was placed before them was that the result of his hon. and learned friend's Amendment would be that gin palaces would be set up in the place of respectable houses, but surely such cases were likely to be very few and far between. He was certain it would be admitted that the great majority of licensing justices honestly tried to do the best they could for their neighbourhoods, and they welcomed the opportunity whenever they got it, not of setting up gin palaces, but of setting up decent commercial houses, where food could be obtained and consumed in comfort, and not in unfit places, or hovels, such as existed in many parts of the country. If the Government insisted on this clause remaining in its present form they would be absolutely checking the work of one of the greatest temperance agencies that they had at the present time, viz., the work of the public-house trusts and of the refreshment-houses associations, and so forth. If the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend were adopted it would give power to those bodies to continue their excellent work. It would enable the justices to substitute a house for one or two, or even three, inefficient and insufficient houses, as the case might be. He had no hesitation in saying that in refusing an Amendment of this kind the Government were not doing anything for temperance; on the contrary, they were striking a blow at the progress of the temperance movement. He hoped that even now, at the eleventh hour, the Solicitor-General would see his way to changing his mind and accepting the Amendment.

MR. LANE-FOX said the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor-General must recognise the very large number of cases in which the public-house trusts had been able to do a great deal of good by paying the surrender value of badly-ventilated and ill-constructed houses, and setting up in their places useful and desirable refreshment places. The Bill, as drawn, made that in future impossible.

The Solicitor-General must know that in a great many cases, in small market towns, there were a large number of old-fashioned houses which were certainly unsuited to the requirements of the present day, and which could be very easily altered and put into better form. It would be absolutely impossible with the Bill as it stood for buildings of that sort to be erected. He could not expect the Government to accept the Amendment, because, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had said, it was contrary to the principles they had announced to the House, and it would make it impossible for the operation contemplated under the next clause to come into effect. Before they finally dismissed the Amendment, however, he wished to ask what justification the House had for rejecting it. What mandate had the House for saddling upon the country a system under which the prohibitory resolutions could be passed by which absolutely all the public-houses in a place could be taken away, it might not be by a bare majority, but by whatever majority the Government pleased? What hon. Member would dare to go before his constituents and say he was prepared to support a measure of total prohibition of that sort? The speech of the Solicitor-General showed that the Government were just as unwilling to trust the magistrates as in another direction they were unwilling to trust the people, and he thought it only right that the country should be made to realise the direction in which the Bill was going.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he should have thought the Government would have taken up a totally different attitude with regard to this Amendment from that they had adopted as expressed by the Solicitor-General, but they had shown themselves absolutely deaf to appeals made to them in the interests of temperance reform upon a basis far more likely to be permanent and to work beneficially in the hands of the people than any of the rather crude prohibitory methods which at present found favour on the Treasury Bench. The principle of the Government Bill was that, when there had been a resolution against a new licence, the resolution should be interpreted to mean actually not that the number of licences should not be increased, but that there should not in the technical sense be a new licence. That was not the form in which the people of the locality would really give the vote. Nobody would contend that if they had a vote in any of the localities, the people would be thinking of the quality of the public-houses or of the technical grant of a new licence. They would be thinking of the total number of public-houses, and what they would be voting for, and what everybody knew they would be voting for, would be that the number of public-houses should not be increased. His hon. friend suggested that they might concede the real principle the Government had in view, and that they might give to the locality an absolute discretion as to the number of licences, but that they should allow some latitude as to the quality of the licences granted. The hon. and learned Gentleman got up and said that if they did that they might see a gin palace substituted for a good and reputable, although a small, public-house. The hon. and learned Gentleman knew perfectly well that that was not what would happen under the Bill. It was neither the intention of the mover of the Amendment, nor was it what was going to happen in any circumstances. What was going to happen was that agencies which were now moving in the direction of true temperance reform, and were striving to the best of their ability to raise the character of public-houses, would receive a serious blow, deliberately dealt by a Government which professed to have the temperance cause at heart. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not made the smallest answer to the arguments of his hon. friend. The case put was this: If a locality decided that there should be no new licence, what they really meant, and what was always meant, was that there should be no increase in the number of licences; but the Bill made it impossible for any proposal to be made to improve the quality. He thought it was remarkable that a Government which claimed to be promoting temperance legislation should seriously defend a policy of that kind. If the Prime Minister were present to listen to the arguments addressed from that side of the House, he did not think the Government would be able to adhere to their decision; but he supposed in the present condition of the benches the members of the Government in charge of the Bill were absolved from answering to those arguments, and in those circumstances he did not think his hon. friend had much chance of carrying his Amendment. By the rejection of the Amendment, the Government were dealing a serious blow at one of the great agencies in favour of temperance, and they were doing that for no object whatever except to maintain the verbal integrity of the Bill they had thrown upon the Table of the House.

SIR S. EVANS said they differed from the view of the right hon. Gentleman and thought he was mistaken as he thought they were mistaken. He could only assure him that even if the Prime Minister were present the answer of the Government would be the same. The Government had no notion at all of preventing the improvement of public-houses. It could be effected by the justices now. The right hon. Gentleman said that what people would vote upon was whether there should be an increase in the number of the public-houses in a locality. What he (the hon. Member speaking) said and what he repeated was that what they would vote against was there being any new licence at all. He therefore differed from the right hon. Gentleman in that matter, and he did not say that where a gin palace was substituted for a small house or two small houses it often happened that they had much more facilities for ordinary drinking, because in the old houses they had more room adapted for recreation than in the new house. If the old licence ought not to exist, they hoped it would be done away with; but there was no reason why, if they gave the locality the right to pass prohibitory resolutions they should create a new licence in a different spot.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs) said that as a matter of fact licensing magistrates made it extremely difficult to improve houses in the direction in which they ought to be improved. The hon. Gentleman in his first speech had given what he thought was a very extreme case. It might have been one in his own private practice in which he succeeded in getting a gin palace erected somewhere or other instead of two small licences which were given away for it. If he succeeded in doing so he was to be congratulated on his success, because licensing benches in Scotland, and he believed in England, looked very narrowly indeed at proposals of this kind, and never granted new licences of that sort in return for a surrender unless they were perfectly satisfied that it would be an improvement on the existing condition of things, and that it was a public necessity, and would, to some extent, increase the accommodation in that locality. Why the Government should cut away the power of the licensing magistrates and reduce them to a position of complete nullity in administering the licensing laws it was difficult to say. They spoke with two voices. At one time they did one thing and at another time another. If there was one thing more patent than another it was that this Bill from beginning to end was a hotch-potch. There had been lots of cooks in the preparation of the Bill, and the result had not been particularly successful. Already the Prime Minister had said he required to-morrow to make Clause 3 read with Clause 2. He supposed Clause 2 was drawn by some people and Clause 3 by others. But be that as it might the whole thing was a complete muddle, and before they got to the end of the Bill, goodness knew what would happen to it. Meantime it was impossible, he supposed, to expect that any reasonable Amendment of this kind would be accepted. Having regard to the fact that it was to have such a wide operation at the end of the time-limit period it seemed certainly not very judicious to leave it in its present unsatisfactory position.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Salter and Mr. Lane-Fox.

*MR. LEIF JONES moved an Amendment substituting the rural parish or urban area within a licensing district for the licensing district as the area in which local option might be exercised. He said the Amendment would make a change in the area over which the local option poll would take place. As it stood in the Bill the area of the local option poll in a borough was the borough or, if the borough was divided into wards, the wards of the borough. But in rural districts the local option area was the licensing district, and he proposed to substitute for the licensing district the parish. It seemed to him very inconvenient to have a different area in Clause 1 for reduction purposes from the area which they had in Clause 2 for local option purposes. The whole of the licences under Clause 1 would be considered by the justices. There would be various statistics gathered together and various facts relating to them. The whole licensing situation, so to speak, would be considered from the point of view of the area in Clause 1, the parish in the case of rural districts and the borough or the ward in the case of a borough. Obviously on the face of it it was desirable to keep to the one area if possible, and, therefore, in

Clause 2 unless good reason was shown to the contrary, they should keep to the area which had already been decided upon as the reduction area in Clause 1. Another very great reason for the change which he proposed was that the licensing district in the rural areas were very much too large for the purpose of the local option poll in regard to new licences. According to the statistics contained in the Blue-book on licensing in 1907, the licensing district, apart from boroughs, averaged about 20,000 population, and an area of 40,000 acres, but sometimes they were very much larger both in population and area. For instance, in his own constituency of North Westmoreland, the east ward had an area of 160,000 acres, and the west ward 140,000 acres. In some licensing districts there was a scattered population with villages ten, twenty, and even thirty miles apart. With regard to new licences it seemed almost irrational to poll villages twenty or thirty miles off on the question whether or not there should be a new licence granted in a village with which they had practically nothing to do. The voters in a village at the extremity of the licensing district would not understand why they should be called upon to settle the licensing problem of a village ten or twenty miles away at the other extremity. There were licensing districts in the neighbourhood of big towns which had an enormous population. Take, for example, the Beacontree Division of Essex, which had a population of 285,892. He had in his possession a list of nineteen or twenty of those large licensing districts with a population of over 75,000. The Edmonton Division had a population of 241,504; Willesden, 182,364; Glamorgan, 159,851; and the Manchester Petty Sessional Division, 163,256. It was obvious that to poll all these people on the question of a new licence at the other end of the division, with which they were very little concerned, was quite an unnecessary process if they accepted the position he took up, namely, that a licence was a matter of local concern affecting only the immediate neighbourhood which it was proposed to serve. His Amendment was of first importance in the case of districts just outside great towns. The Brentford Petty Sessional Division of Middlesex had a total population of 124,000, and some of the parishes embraced in that area were growing whilst others were stationary. Take, for example, Ealing, which in 1901 had a population of 33,031, and an estimated population in 1904 of 39,920; Twickenham, 20,991 in 1901, and an estimated population in 1904 of 24,500. Those were growing districts in the neighbourhood of London to which working men went to escape from public-houses, and it was essential if this clause was going to be any use at all in such districts that his Amendment should be accepted. In the case of Ealing and Twickenham it would be quite sufficient to let the people of those parishes vote in this matter themselves, and not call in places ten or twenty miles away. He wished to point out how the decision in regard to Clause 1 would affect the smaller districts. In most of the parishes of the country there could not be any new licences. In the county of Cumberland, where there were 206 civil parishes, there were only fifty-three in which there could be a new licence under the Bill, because the scale of licences fixed already settled that the other 153 were fully supplied. In the Penrith licensing district, which contained eight civil parishes, the question of licence could only arise in eight parishes because thirty of those parishes were already fully supplied, according to the scale of the Bill. Some of the villages were thirty miles apart, and it seemed altogether to defeat the intention of the Government to allow those scattered villages to vote on questions which scarcely concerned them at all. When the late Sir William Harcourt introduced his Bill on this question in 1895, the area chosen by him was practically the same as he was now proposing. Some parishes would probably be too small for the purpose. There were 4,654 parishes with a population of less than 200, and his figures dealing with those of less than 100, and between 50 and 100, are quite recognised that it might be desirable to group some of these parishes. An important point was that the area decided upon now would become the area at the end of the time limit. He had heard the argument used against local veto in the House, that they were likely sometimes to enforce it upon an unwilling population. He could understand that situation as it was if they took a very large area. Most of what hon. Members opposite called fallacies of prohibition very largely arose from the attempt to group together different areas with the result that a large rural population might be imposed upon a small urban area a condition of things which the urban area did not desire. That was the experience in the United States in places to which hon. Members had already referred. He agreed that this kind of legislation could not be effective unless they had a strong popular opinion behind it. The Reference had already been made in the Blue-book issued by the Fox Committee on the experience of local option in the United States, and this emphasised the importance of having behind the local option the influence of the local population. That Report said—

On grounds of local convenience, as well as the experience of other countries, it was desirable they should choose the smaller area rather than the larger one.

Mr. Leif Jones.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 10, after the word 'in,' to insert the words 'any rural parish or urban area within.'"—(Mr. Leif Jones.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rosendale) congratulated the hon. Member upon the very able and moderate statement he had made in moving this Amendment. This point could not be a question of party contention, because precisely the same Amendment was down on the Paper in the name of an hon. Member opposite. This was not a question of principle at all, but a question of machinery and of local convenience. There had never been any doubt in his mind that the licensing districts, taken as a whole, must in many cases be too large, and that it would have been inevitable to have divided some or perhaps many of the larger licensing districts. Obviously it was inconvenient to bring the voting influence of a somewhat distant parish or town to bear upon another parish which might reasonably wish to prevent an increase of licences in their locality. He thought it would be unwise to put these localities to the trouble of voting on such a matter. The hon. Member had referred to the Bill of 1895, which took practically the same words as he had moved. As he had already said, if licensing districts were to be adhered to, it would mean that there would have to be in a large number of cases sub-divisions of those districts. He had come to the conclusion that it would be better to take the words of the hon. Member and adopt the rural, parish, or urban area. He therefore accepted the words of the Amendment, but with the proviso that probably on the Report stage it might be necessary to change the words in order to make the proposal applicable to the Bill. While he would not change the sense of the Amendment he desired to reserve the right he had mentioned. It might be necessary and desirable in the case of very small parishes to arrive at some method of grouping such as was suggested in the Bill of 1895.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) confessed that he was astonished at the acceptance of the Amendment by the Government. The hon. Member for the Appleby division had put forward a strong plea for small areas. On the question of areas he was prepared to support an Amendment on the Paper in the names of some hon. Members behind him. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that there were certain large areas, but he entirely ignored the much greater preponderance of small parishes. The right hon. Gentleman had indicated the opinion which he held in regard to the Amendment, and stated that on the Report stage he might change the words to make them applicable to the Bill. Perhaps by that time he or the Prime Minister would have on the Paper some Amendment which would show how the Government proposed to deal with small parishes. In passing he wished to say that he thought it would have been better if the promised Amendment had been put on the Paper on Clause 2 instead of having to wait for Clause 3 or some future clause in the Bill. He himself certainly professed to know more about the country districts than the urban districts, and he thought the inconvenience in country districts would be extremely great. They were not giving local option in the clause. It would be simply local veto, and it would have the effect of driving all the drinking population into one small area. The Government were going to accept this proposal to put all over England the same difficulty in the way of all the small parishes. He was sure that that would not be acceptable to the majority of the inhabitants in the country districts. Judging from the Amendment which they had discussed, and from the speech of the Solicitor-General, the Government were thinking only of certain urban districts. They were afraid of closing unnecessary houses in case gin palaces might be opened. They forgot that the same rule did not apply to country districts. Unless they were going to group areas up to 10,000 or 20,000, he thought the policy which the Government had decided upon would be of a very disastrous kind. He had no doubt that the question would receive great consideration on this Amendment and on the Amendment which his hon. friends desired to move to increase the areas. He was not certain whether the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield could be brought on at a later stage, and on the point of order he asked the ruling of the Chairman.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CALDWELL): I will look into it before we reach it.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that as the Amendment now before the Committee put the question in a way which enabled them to discuss it, he thought they should thoroughly discuss it now rather than take the chance of discussing it on an Amendment which was to come on later and which might be ruled out of order.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The Amendment would be in order.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I thought so. I think that any decision taken on this Amendment would not rule out the Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for Sheffield. So far as this Amendment is concerned I am certain that hon. Gentlemen behind me will oppose the smaller areas, for we are certain that they would not be in the interest of administration or temperance.

EARL WINTERTON said he understood the Deputy-Chairman to rule that if this Amendment was accepted by the House, the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield would not be in order.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I said the very reverse.

SIR SAMUEL EVANS: On the point of order, perhaps it would be better to let that matter stand until we reach the Amendment.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I would point out that if we were to wait to a later stage, we might be cut out of opportunity for discussion altogether.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: It is inconvenient to give a ruling on point just now. Hon. Members that there may be another in the when the Amendment is reached is more convenient that the Chair who is in the Chair when the Amendment is reached should give the ruling.

MR. YOUNGER: May I point out that if the words of the hon. Member for Sheffield Amendment are put in the Bill restricting the areas, words increasing areas cannot be moved.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That is the point I have stated. We will deal with the Amendment when it is reached.

EARL WINTERTON: I gathered, if I may say so, that the decision which has been come to is the decision of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman made use of the "I" in the course of his speech gathered that he had come to a decision almost on the spur of the moment.

MR. L. HARCOURT: Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the Committee if I tell them that the noble Lord is mistaken.

EARL WINTERTON said he was sorry that he had formed a wrong impression. Certainly any impartial listener to his speech would have come to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman made up his mind on the spot at the moment to accept the Amendment. The light-hearted way in which the right hon. Gentleman accepted the Amendment showed that the Government could have given little consideration to the matter. It was a matter of great importance, and under the circumstances in which the Government had placed it, a most ridiculous state of affairs. There were parishes in Eng-

had only a small number of inhabitants, and under the Amendment the area for exercising local option would be the parish. He did not think that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite really realised the effect the Amendment would have in small parishes. There were parishes six or seven miles long and barely a mile broad, and the effect of the Amendment would be that a man living in the middle would only have to go half a mile north or south to get into an area where there was no local option. To carry out the hon. Gentleman's suggestion logically, it would be necessary to have some kind of gendarmie to prevent people from going out of one parish into another. He appealed to the Committee before passing this Amendment to consider the ludicrous position the country would be placed in if the parish area were adopted.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said that morally, if not technically, it would be impossible hereafter to discuss any enlarging Amendment if this one were decided in the affirmative. It was necessary now to say how much they on that side of the House regretted the decision of the right hon. Gentleman. By accepting the Amendment, as they thought with such levity, the right hon. Gentleman had totally ignored the dignity, independence, and the right to be treated as efficient self-governing communities of all the great boroughs of the country. The effect of the Amendment was to make local option between ward and ward in all the great boroughs. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to leave to these great boroughs the option of saying for themselves in what way they would regulate this great and important matter in their own areas.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said he objected entirely to these small areas. By an Amendment which he had on the Paper he proposed that the area should be that of Quarter Sessions or boroughs with over 25,000 inhabitants. Areas of that kind, he thought, would be much more suitable than the licensing districts which the Government proposed. But by the Amendment which the Government had accepted the licensing districts were going to be split up into small areas quite unsuitable for the purpose intended. The border difficulty was a real difficulty, and one which was fully appreciated by the right hon. Member for Spen Valley when he waited on the Prime Minister last year. The right hon. Gentleman appreciated the difficulty in regard to Sunday closing, and the same argument exactly applied to local veto. The report of the deputation which waited last December on the present Prime Minister, stated that the right hon. the Member for Spen Valley—

The Prime Minister asked: “Why should it not be left to localities?” to which the right hon. the Member for Spen Valley replied: “Because the difficulty of drawing a border-line is enormous.” What border-line was he and the hon. Member for Appleby going to draw now? The right hon. Gentleman continued—

The area was now to be the ward. It might be a ward densely populated, close together, in a small area in which the division went down the middle of the street, so that there was a border difficulty even as the clause now stood. He was afraid under the procedure that night they would not have an opportunity of discussing this question properly. They who represented county boroughs entirely objected even to wards being made the districts for polling on this important question. He was afraid it was almost too late to ask the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider his decision. It was hardly treating the House fairly for the right hon. Gentleman to accept an Amendment from a prominent Member of his own party on an important question of this kind. The Government ought to have considered it when they were framing their Bill. Representatives of the county boroughs could only enter their protest as he now did on their behalf.

MR. DICKINSON (St. Pancras, N.) said that from the point of view of London, he heartily welcomed the assent of the Government to this Amendment. The Bill, as drafted, proposed that the local option area should be the licensing district, but in London the licensing districts were very large—the one he represented contained half a million individuals—and the proposal, therefore, was, so far as London was concerned, wholly inefficient and impracticable. He would be glad to learn from the First Commissioner of Works whether or not the local option areas in London would be the wards of the Metropolitan boroughs in the same way as he proposed for the other boroughs in the country.

MR. BONAR LAW (Camberwell, Dulwich) said that the hon. Gentleman supported the Amendment accepted by the Government for the very good reason that he was not thoroughly satisfied with the Bill as it stood, and that any change would be for the better from his point of view. His hon. friend had expressed surprise that the Government had accepted this Amendment, and he evidently misunderstood the speech of the First Commissioner of Works. As he understood it, what the right hon. Gentleman intended to do was to throw another small sop to the extreme section of the Party behind him, and of course the value of the compliment was greatly increased by the statement that he had been greatly impressed with the arguments brought forward by the hon. Member for Appleby. There was nothing whatever surprising in the Amendment considering the direction from which it came, or in the Government's adopting it. It was natural that the hon. Member who moved it should wish the area to be small. He knew that if they made the area a large one, the chance of finding a sufficient number of faddists to put local option into operation was extremely small; and he knew, on the other hand, that the smaller the area the better the chance there would be of finding a few gentlemen who held the views he ably represented, and of seeing local option adopted. The action of the right hon. Gentleman, and the attitude of the Government to the Amendment had placed the Committee in an almost ludicrous position—in a position exactly the same as they were in earlier in the afternoon. The Prime Minister deliberately set aside one whole day to discuss the principle of local option. They came to discuss it, and found that what they were discussing was not the principle of a local option which was often to be applied, but the principle of a local option which was only to be put into effect in regard to cases which would never happen, or which were so few in the total that there was not a single one in the Committee who cared whether they were discussed or not. The subject of local option, the subject they were to discuss the whole day, was locked up in the bosom of His Majesty's Government and nothing would induce them to discuss the Committee what that principle was. The right hon. Gentleman opposed the Amendment up the same attitude toward the particular proposal. They were to discuss the area, but what the area was to be was sacred to the Government. The House of Commons had been adjourned to a good deal of closure of business, but they had reached a stage to which had never been reached before. They were discussing for the first time as a practical proposal a system of local option. Local option had been discussed previously academically in a Bill, or on a private Member's motion, but here was a system of local option which was to be put into operation. The right hon. Gentleman was to discuss them later on. In the meantime they were to decide what the area was to be, to which this local option was to be applied without the smallest knowledge of what it was to be, except that it was to be the area in the Bill as it was framed. They were given no opportunity to stand that there was to be a local option, but what the nature of the

was to be they did not know. He was perfectly certain that the right hon. Gentleman did not tell them about the grouping, for the very good reason that probably he did not know.

MR. L. HARCOURT said that he only rose in order to explain to the hon. Gentleman that he had quite distinctly stated that he had accepted on behalf of the Government the rural parish or the urban area in the words of the Amendment, and he only suggested that it might possibly be necessary, at a later stage, to effect some grouping for the convenience of the smaller parishes. He wished to make it clear to his hon. friend the Member for North St. Pancras that the Amendment which he had foreshadowed would probably be necessary on the Report stage in order to carry out his hon. friend's intention, and would make it perfectly clear that, as regarded London, they would adopt the areas of the wards of the Metropolitan boroughs.

*MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had in mind the definition of a suburban area which was inserted in Clause 1, subsection 1, by the Home Secretary, under the Closure, without any discussion whatever. It declared that for the purpose of a definition of an urban area, a Metropolitan borough should be deemed to be a borough, and, where part of a ward of a borough or urban district was situated in one licensing district and part in another, each such part of the ward should be treated as part of the ward with which it had the longest common boundary in the same licensing district. That had surely escaped the notice of the hon. Member for St. Pancras. He would like to know how the Government who had accepted the Amendment intended to deal with a Metropolitan borough under such Amendment.

MR. JOHN WARD said the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dulwich had spoken of the proposal which was before the House as most ridiculous and as one which could have been fashioned only in the brain of a teetotal fanatic, yet the same Amendment appeared on the Order Paper in the name of one of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues.

MR. BONAR LAW said that what he spoke of as fanaticism was the idea of the possibility of local option being adopted.

MR. JOHN WARD said there was not the slightest doubt that what the hon. Member was discussing was the Amendment, and that Amendment which he described as absurd would have been moved by one of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues but for the accident of his absence from the House at the moment. That was a fairly good estimate of the whole of the speech to which they had listened. He was interested in this question as it applied to London, and he thought it would be a great mistake if the wards of the different boroughs of London were to be taken as the areas for deciding under this clause of the Bill. Take, for instance, a district which he knew perfectly well—Wandsworth—as an illustration. Here was the old parish of Wandsworth split up into four wards, and if they were going to have one ward on one side of the street declaring in favour of vetoing of licences and another on the other side declaring in the opposite direction there would be considerable confusion, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman had found that he would have to make some special arrangement in regard to London. At least he was going to vote in favour of the Amendment on the promise that this would be reconsidered on the Report stage.

*MR. CAVE said he did not understand how the hon. Member was going to vote for the Amendment after the speech which he had delivered, because the argument which he had put forward with regard to London boroughs was exactly the argument which appeared vital to the Opposition with regard to other areas. If a small parish were made the voting area, and it decided in favour of prohibition, those residents in that parish who wished to obtain drink would go outside in order to get it, and this legislation would be entirely ineffective. There were three objections to the Amendment. First, if the matter was to be determined by a popular vote the larger the number the more likely it was to be right, and therefore they ought to appeal not to the little population of a small parish but to a larger population. They had it from the First Commissioner of Works that they must take the parish as the area. That was to say, 200 or 300 people representing perhaps 50 or 60 houses were going to decide for all the inhabitants of that place. It was quite possible in a place like that to get a number of people with strong opinions—faddists—to vote for prohibition, but if they appealed to a large area the possibilities of getting an impartial decision were much more hopeful. Secondly, if they appealed to a large area they did not get the personal interest which they had in a smaller place, and it was undoubtedly true that in a small parish personal interest might affect the vote. If they could provide that only those interested could vote, they reduced the area very much, but that was not the plan of the Government; they were going to give the vote to people who had no interest whatever in the matter. Thirdly, there was the border difficulty to which he had referred, and which would be enormously increased by this Amendment. Therefore, he thought they were right in upholding the view that the larger the area the better.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY said that, having an Amendment on the Paper in order to increase the area, he felt he should like to say a few words about this Amendment which had been accepted by the right hon. Gentleman. He thought the effect of the clause would be even worse in rural parishes than in urban districts, especially as regards the boundary question. If a prohibitory resolution were passed by a bare majority in a small parish, he would like the House to picture to itself the friction and dismay which would occur. A minority would know who had carried the resolution against them, and there would be very little friendship and good feeling in that parish for a long time afterwards. The border difficulty would be increased in exactly the proportion by which the voting areas were decreased in size. If the area was small, they promptly brought into play competitive forces between various parishes, and there might arise a position in which a publican might vote for prohibition in one part of the area because prohibition there would increase his trade at a house on the other side of the boundary. That seemed to him to reduce this vote to a greater absurdity than it was in the Government Bill when introduced. He could not imagine what had induced the Government to accept the Amendment, certainly was far from being an improvement on the original clause. From the experience in every country where a local veto had been tried, it had no chance of working successfully except in a large area, and in proportion to the reduction in the area the plan was less successful. The Government had given no solution of the border difficulty. In a small parish fanatics might put prohibition into operation with gross unfairness, the larger the area was the more it would be for those fanatics to carry their way. The Government had introduced an Amendment which would be unfair in its application, and was very far from being an improvement on the original clause.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Alexander Acland
Viscount Valentia

*MR. STUART WORTLEY said he desired to move an Amendment which was in manuscript. He apologised for not having put it on the Paper, but the House would appreciate why. Some Members had been taken completely by surprise, and had been somewhat embarrassed by the unexpected acceptance of the last Amendment by the Government. He rose to insert in line 11 after the words "licensing districts" the words "or in any large borough by Section 15 of this Act." It unnecessary to enlarge upon the enormous claims which the Government had upon the consideration of the House owing to their unrivalled organisation with regard to the Act within the borough. The Amendment, if accepted, should lead to a Amendment which should be inserted within their own boundaries.

boroughs themselves should settle what should be the local veto area. He submitted to hon. Members on both sides of the House that no one could organise these important powers so satisfactorily as the great boroughs. That being so, he begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 11, after the word 'district,' to insert the words 'or in any large borough as defined in Section 15 of this Act.'"—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR S. EVANS said the right hon. Gentleman had no right to suggest that by reason of the acceptance of the previous Amendment the Committee had been placed in an embarrassing position. On the merits of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal he could only say that the decision which the Committee had just taken was exactly contrary to the principle of this Amendment, because the Government had made it clear that after gravely considering the matter, after giving consideration to the difficulties of boundary and to the question of homogeneity of population, the licensing district as such was too large an area for the purpose of giving effect to the desires of the people who were really affected.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth), as representing one of the large boroughs, urged upon the Committee the necessity of accepting the Amendment. He thought temperance was the object of this Bill. It was quite certain that no borough would be able to carry a vote of prohibition in every one of the wards, and therefore the position would be that some wards would be favoured, if it was considered to be a favour to have the power of drinking, and that others would be damaged. He had himself seen a case in America where prohibition was in force in one district, and not in another on the opposite side of a river. What was the result? When the river was crossed it was found that the first twelve houses in that district were licensed houses. The same might be said in this country, where one ward might be called, as they were called in America, a "dry ward," and the other a "wet ward." Was it desirable that such terms should be applied to boroughs in this country? It was too preposterous to suggest that it would be convenient to have all the public-houses in one borough closed and in another borough open. The suggestion of the Government was perfectly preposterous, and he should certainly show it up in the country on every possible chance.

*MR. G. D. FABER thought that if they wanted to get a true expression of opinion on prohibition, the larger the area the better. They would get a real opinion if they had a large area, whereas, if they had an infinitesimal area, they would have nothing but faddists at work and never get a real expression of opinion at all. A large area would also give them a truer test of the value of prohibition. York, the constituency he represented, was divided into wards, but if he wanted to test prohibition there—it was really the last thing he wanted—he should certainly have it over the whole of York and take a vote of the whole of York upon it. He would not cut the city up into wards. He would thus get a true expression of the opinion of York; and, if prohibition did promote temperance, it would be much better to have.

it operative throughout the whole area of the city than to separate the wards and have it in operation only in some of them. A prohibition resolution might be passed in one only of the six wards of York. A man would then merely have to walk 200 yards out of one ward into another. How was prohibition to be effective under such a system? If the hon. Member for Westmoreland desired prohibition to be effective, he was going a very funny way to make it so. They were certainly not going to promote temperance by cutting large boroughs up into all these districts: just the reverse. They were going to reduce the working of the clause to a farce. If he were in favour of drinking and not in favour of temperance, he would advise making the areas as small as possible, because then prohibition would become farcical. He could not understand why the First Commissioner of Works ever accepted the Amendment. He did not know whether the Government were going to be rather harder on the temperance party as the Bill went on and that, therefore, it was better at this stage to throw them a little sop; but, so far as they had gone, the Nonconformist tail was wagging the dog, and he was sorry for it.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he was quite unable to follow the reasoning which had led the Government to their decision. He understood the view of the Government was that by diminishing the facilities for drinking, or by removing them altogether, they would reduce drunkenness. He would accept that view for the moment; but if it were to be tried with any reasonable prospect of success, they must make their area of such a size that it was easy for anyone within a prohibited area to evade the restrictions of the Act by going just outside that area. That argument pointed to the necessity of having large areas in which the prohibition would be taken. He ventured to say that where they could show even a colourable success of prohibition by local option it was always in areas where the population was considerable, and where the population had little opportunity only at long intervals of going outside that area into a place where drink was to be obtained. It was well known that in certain densely populated districts in America men could for long periods make money by prohibition, but men who were thus compulsorily made sober by the action of Parliament took their revenge from time to time they went to a neighbouring city by spending their earnings of three or six months in a wild debauch of three or six weeks. They could not, however, apply even a temporary success to a case where a man would only have to go a short distance in order to get into an area where the sale of drink was freely permitted. It was possible that by taking a small area as the ordinary parish they might sometime be able to give them some success, but not a very hopeful one, of the efficacy of the Bill; but, if they separated the wards of towns separately, what chance had they?

MR. LEIF JONES: Then what chance had they?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that the hon. Member if he thought prohibition helped his case. The hon.

thought that if he was able to show that the Bill did not help temperance he might not object to its passing, but he wholly misconceived his position. He was not so clamorous as the hon. Member and he was not so intemperate in his views upon temperance, but he thought he had as great a dislike of the disgusting vice of intemperance, and, if they were to deal with the licensing question, he earnestly desired that they should make some progress in checking what was an admitted evil, and, if by the courtesy and rules of the House he was permitted to intervene in the debate, his object would be to make the Bill more suitable to bring about temperance reform than it existed at present. If they took ward areas in towns, they would reduce any prospect of the successful working of local option to an absolute farce. On one side of the street a man would be forbidden to buy or to sell drink, whilst on the other they might have houses, limited in number and accommodation, which were crowded. They would not check the demand for drink in the prohibited areas, and they would not check in any material degree the obtaining of drink by those who lived in them, but they would produce over-crowding and other evils in immediately neighbouring districts. Whilst producing those evils, they could not pretend that they would in any way serve the cause of temperance. He had heard much from American friends and knew something from his own experience of what went on in small urban areas in America where prohibition was enforced. He was once challenged at a public meeting to give his own personal experience in America. He accepted the challenge and answered in a sentence. He had been in these prohibited areas, and he got liquor without any difficulty in all of them. That was what would happen in this country if they proceeded with legislation of this kind against the general sense of the majority of reasonable people. In our great towns certain wards presented very special features. There were central wards which had a population in the day time who had to be provided with mid-day meals. The day population was wholly disproportionate to the electoral roll or to the night population, but they were putting it in the power of the night population of those central wards, or of such electors as happened to be on the register for them, to decide whether or not the day population should have any facilities for obtaining wine or any alcoholic refreshment for their mid-day meal. Was not that a ludicrous proposal? Had there been any explanation of it by the Government or one word of justification for its adoption? He was utterly unable to follow the reasoning of the Government on the question. If they wished to reduce their proposals to a nullity and make local option a farce they could not have taken a better course.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said that perhaps he might be allowed to express his own experience, drawn from action for which he was largely responsible in the City of Liverpool. Very large tracts of Liverpool had come under the principle of prohibition. His own experience and the experience of those who had gone before him demonstrated the fact that the imposition of prohibitory restrictions over large areas in towns had not only operated to the general advantage of those districts, but had not in any way led to the results in surrounding districts at which the right hon. Gentleman had hinted. In his experience, what had been done in prohibitory areas had been welcomed by all who lived in them, and he had never seen protests of any kind by residents. He felt certain that if this provision were carried out it would lead, not only to the great advantage of the rural districts, but to the great advantage of city life. No doubt the imposition of this restriction in single wards would eventually lead to a general policy being adopted, and he felt certain experience of the past would not be belied.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) hoped the Amendment would be adopted, because it would reduce the absurdity to which the House was committed by the last Amendment which had been passed. The Bill was justified on many grounds. He believed its chief justification in the eyes of hon. Members opposite was that they thought it was going to do a great deal of harm to the owners of licensed premises, but they did not always like to avow that. Sometimes they pretended that it was going to reduce the amount of drunkenness in the country. The Amendment which was last carried would undoubtedly enormously increase the facilities for drunkenness in comparison with the proposal of the Government as originally put down in the Bill, because it was surely far easier for an individual who wanted to get drunk to go over the boundary if the boundary was only situated a short distance from his own door, than if the area was much larger and he had to take a six mile walk before he could procure anything to drink. It was quite possible that even under the last Amendment in some cases in a large scattered country parish where prohibition is put into force a man might find it difficult to get a public-house, but it was obvious on the face of it that that difficulty would be entirely done away with in a borough, because in a borough the distances were far smaller, and would always be easy for a man who happened to live in a district where there was prohibition to go over the boundary and get a drink somewhere else. He did not think this would decrease drinking in the least; it would increase it, and for a very simple reason. It was a known fact that people tended to get drunk far more if they were gathered together in large numbers. It was the experience of a great many countries that there was less drunkenness where everybody privately was allowed to sell drink. In the experience of countries in the north of Europe where they drank beer. Where they only got two or three people gathered together in a room they soon gave up treating each other. They had as much as they wanted to drink and went away, but if they got hundreds of people gathered together in a small inconvenient public-house they were much more likely to get drunk than if they spread, what hon. Members opposite considered a nuisance, indiscriminately over the whole district. He thought this particular proposal was simply a piece of Puritanical cant, and he objected to it the more because in this case he did not think it was hypocrisy. It was Puritanical cant at the taxpayers' expense. If this drinking was a nuisance it was only fair that the district should suffer for it. It was to concentrate the whole of the nuisance on their neighbours. Let them also of the difficulty of police supervision. They were going to concentrate the whole of the drinking perhaps in the small area of a town. They would have to increase the police in that area, and it would be far more difficult because the police might be able to cope with one drunkard in every street, but it was very difficult if they were going to concentrate twenty drunkards in a single street. It seemed to him that this proposal to which the House had partly committed itself was to upset the whole principle of the Bill, because they had laid it down in the First Schedule that they were going to place the public-houses according to the number of population to the acre. But now they would have to place the public-houses, if they were going on any logical principle at all, not according to the number of population per acre in that particular ward or licensing area, but according to the number of people who were compelled to flock into that restricted area by the prohibition restrictions which were enforced all round, and it seemed to him that this system would strike at the whole principle of the Bill. The real truth of the matter was that the hon. Member who brought forward the resolution was anxious to get prohibition on any terms. He supposed he would like to be able to tell his constituents that he had got it, but it was quite obvious that prohibition would, from the temperance point of view, be quite ineffective, and it would not carry out the function which it would have carried out if the Government had stuck to their original proposal. They, no doubt, wanted these smaller districts because it would be easier to get an extreme expression of opinion among a few people than if they trusted to the common sense of a large district where they could get an average opinion. He strongly objected to the extension of these small areas because it was only another case of the tendency which the Government had already shown of loading the dice against those who showed any signs of disagreement.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said he was struck with the extraordinarily small amount of reply that there was on the merits of this Amendment. The official reply was that the House was practically prejudiced in its discretion by the decision which was arrived at on the previous Amendment. Nothing of the kind was the case. At the best that was a surprise decision, and it was one in which the House acted in the full belief that it was not prejudging the case of the great towns, for, after all, subsection (7) still remained on the Paper, and the House ought to have an opportunity of discussing this Amendment, and that was the proper occasion on which to safeguard the interest of the great towns. There remained only the remark of the hon. Member for Denbighshire, which amounted to this, that in Liverpool, by philanthropic action against which he had not a word to say, some small prohibitionist areas seemed to have been created. But of what use were these to argument? They pleased all parties. They pleased the temperance people as far as they went, and they did not interfere in the least with the habits of the drinking people. Let there be no mistake. This was an Amendment to safeguard the autonomy and dignity of the great municipal areas, and to leave them free to say for themselves within their own area whether the local option area should be the city itself, the whole municipal area, or a single ward, or a grouping of wards made by the city itself, which the House ought to trust with that duty.

MR. RICHARDSON (Nottingham, S.) said he could foresee a difficulty if the Amendment was carried. There was immediately contiguous to the city of Nottingham a place called West Bridgeford. It had a population of 11,000. Over the whole area of that place, with the exception of an old public-house, called the "Trent Bridge Inn," connected with the cricket ground, there was not a single licensed house. This was because Liberals and Conservatives, Churchmen and Nonconformists, had, from the early beginnings of that village, formed an association for the purpose of opposing the introduction of any licensed house in the place. West Bridgeford was one of the most prosperous and respectable villages in the county of Nottingham. Now, there had been houses bought by men interested in liquor trade for the purpose of opening licensed premises, and every year, whenever the brewers came forward and asked for a licence, the whole of the 11 people were represented, undivided by religion or politics, before the magistrates, to oppose such licensing. The result was that the magistrates would not grant a single licence. There was a movement on foot to include West Bridgeford in the borough of Nottingham, but if the Amendment were carried, it was quite certain it would induce the inhabitants of West Bridgeford to oppose inclusion for the very reason that they did not want and would not have a public-house there.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Repairing H.M.S. "Gladiator."

MR. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, in view of the fact that H.M.S. "Gladiator" was on her way to Chatham for repairs when she was sunk in a collision in the Solent, whether, as soon as she has been sufficiently repaired to enable her to continue her voyage from Portsmouth, she may be sent on to Chatham Dockyard for completion.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The course to be taken with the "Gladiator" will be decided when the estimated cost of repairing the ship is known.

Old-Age Pensions Regulations.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will lay upon the Table of the House the Old-Age Pensions Regulations of 20th August and the Local Government Board Circular on the Old-Age Pensions Act dated 21st August.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Regulations under Section 10 of the Old-Age Pensions Act, 1908 (which have been in force as provisional regulations since 20th August last), are being signed to-day and will, in accordance with the requirements of that section, be laid before both Houses of Parliament forthwith. The Local Government Board Circular of 21st August on the subject of the Regulations will be laid upon the Table by my right hon. friend.

Roman Catholic Disabilities.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that by an Act, 30 and 31 Vic., c. 62, passed in 1867 holders of the offices of the Lord-Chancellorship of Great Britain, the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland, and the Chancellorships of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which are confined to members of the Protestant faith, have been relieved from the necessity of making the declaration required of the Sovereign as his first public act on accession to the Throne in repudiation of Roman Catholic doctrines, notably the doctrine of Transubstantiation as idolatrous and blasphemous, and that no Roman Catholic has, since the abolition by statute of this declaration, been enabled to fill any of those offices; whether he is aware that the Sovereign alone is required to make this declaration by which he is placed in an isolated position, and that in the event of a Regency the declaration is not required from the Regent of the Kingdom, and that other statutory provisions secure that the occupant of the Throne should be a professor of the Protestant faith; and whether, having regard to the fact that the making of a declaration of this kind is couched in terms offensive to the feelings of the King's Roman Catholic subjects and unnecessary for the exclusion of Catholics from the Throne, the Government is prepared to take steps to secure by legislation the abolition of this declaration which is imposed exclusively on the Sovereign.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The question whether steps cannot be taken to alter the language of the declaration while leaving the sense untouched has been the subject of much consideration, and presents many difficulties. The Government are not as at present advised prepared to introduce legislation, but they will give careful attention to any suggestions which seem likely to lead to a solution.

Suggested Weekly Payment of Army Pensions.

COLONEL WARDE (Kent, Medway): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the disadvantages resulting from the present system of quarterly payment of pensions and deferred pay to the rank and file of the Army, they can in future be made weekly according to the system proposed in the case of old-age pensions.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Army Council has yet considered the possibility of paying Army pensions weekly through the post offices in the same way as old-age pensions; what would be the extra cost, if any, of carrying out such a proposal; and whether any circumstances exist in which it is at present possible to arrange for weekly instead of quarterly payments of pensions.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Hove): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, having regard to the obvious disadvantages connected with the payment of military pensions quarterly by the boards of guardians, he will consider the feasibility of introducing legislation to enable the pensions to be paid weekly by the old-age pensions committees.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): To ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been called to the fact that the pensions under the Old-Age Pensions Act are to be paid weekly; and whether he will give instructions for Army pensioners to receive their pensions also at such periods.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
In reply to these Questions I would refer the hon. Members to my reply to a similar Question put yesterday by my hon. friend the Member for the Isle of Wight Division of Hampshire.

Position of Quartermasters of Territorial Engineers.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether a decision has yet been reached as to the inclusion in the establishment of quartermasters of Royal Engineers Volunteer Corps who have transferred to the Territorial Force; and when the position of these officers will be defined.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
This question is now under consideration.

Posting of Officers to Special Reserve Units.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state when the appointment of officers of the late Militia to the staff of 3rd battalions of infantry regiments will take place.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
The adjutants and quartermasters of the late Militia have been already posted to the Special Reserve units. As regards the late Militia officers, they have, with a few exceptions, been already gazetted to the 3rd battalions.

Case of Lieutenant-Colonel W. G. Ley.

MR. LEHMANN (Leicestershire, Market Harborough): To ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to the conduct of Lieutenant-Colonel W. G. Ley, commanding the 1st North Staffordshire Regiment, who was charged before the justices at Aldershot on 24th September with cruelty to a cat; and if he intends to take any action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
Yes, Sir. My attention has been drawn to this incident, and action is being taken.

Transfer of Officers from Disbanded Battalions.

EARL WINTERTON: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to cases which have arisen of officers in line battalions being superseded by officers transferred from disbanded battalions of other regiments, and which have led to a considerable amount of hardship; and whether he will consider if there is any method of mitigating the block in promotion thus caused.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
As I have already explained to the House in reference to this subject, cases of disbandment in any branch of the service must necessarily cause retardation of promotion, but this is spread throughout the branch concerned and it is expedient to consider the interests of the infantry officers as a body rather than those of any particular regiment.

Muzzle Velocity of British and Foreign Rifles.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can inform the House what is the muzzle velocity produced by the ammunition used in the Lee-Enfield rifle with which the British Army is now armed; and what is the muzzle velocity given by the ammunition used in the German Army, the Austrian Army, and the United States Army.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
The velocities are as follows:—

British	-	2,060 f.s. with 215 gr. bullet
German	-	2,900 „ 154 „
Austrian	-	2,030 „ 244 „
United States of America	2,650	„ 150 „

Lee-Enfield Breech Action and High Velocity Ammunition.

MR. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the breech action of the Lee-Enfield rifle with which the British troops are now armed is strong enough to stand the high pressure that would be produced by the use of a high-velocity ammunition such as has been adopted by Germany, Austria, and the United States.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) 2,600 feet seconds can be obtained in the short Lee-Enfield rifle with a 150-grains bullet without exceeding the pressure which the breech action is amply strong enough to stand.

Dismissals from Woolwich Arsenal.

MR. G. GOOCH (Bath): To ask the Secretary of State for War how many men have been dismissed from Woolwich Arsenal since 1st January, 1908; what is the total number dismissed since the accession to office of the present Government; and how many were dismissed between the close of the South African War and the resignation of the late Government.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The figures for the ordnance factories at Woolwich are as follow:—The number of men discharged on reduction from week ending 4th January, 1908, to 10th October, 1908, is 106. The total number discharged on reduction from 1st December, 1905, to 10th October, 1908, is 3,187. The total number discharged on reduction from 1st June, 1902, to 30th November, 1905, was 4,567.

Dismissals from the Army.

MR. G. GOOCH: To ask the Secretary of State for War how many men have been dismissed from the Army during the tenure of office by the present Government without being offered service on equally favourable conditions in other units.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The hon. Member is presumably referring to the units which were disbanded. No men belonging to these units were dismissed from the Army. Those who did not complete their service in their units were either posted or voluntarily transferred to other units or transferred to the Reserve at their own request on guarantee of obtaining employment.

Distribution of Untenanted Land on the Caldbeck Estate.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the proposed distribution of the untenanted land on the Caldbeck estate, Ballacolla, Queen's County, Thomas Cunningham, Ballacolla, has been allotted 20 acres, and a man named Guilfoyle 38 acres; whether he is aware that Cunningham is postmaster in Ballacolla, from which he derives an income of £150 a year, and in addition has a lucrative business and 52 acres of land purchased on another estate, and that Guilfoyle has already 34 acres of land, also purchased out, as well as his emoluments as estate bailiff to Captain Caldbeck; and, if so, can he say who is responsible for allotting such an extent of land to those wealthy men to the exclusion of the claims of a large number of small holders, labourers, and farmers' sons in the district; and if the Estates Commissioners have approved of this proposal.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have not yet approved of a scheme for the allotment of the untenanted land on this estate.

MR. DELANY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Estates Commissioners' inspector, Mr. Booth, who visited Ballacolla on 29th September last, for the purpose of investigating the claims of those who applied for a portion of the untenanted land on the Caldbeck estate, occupied a room in the house of Thomas Cunningham, who, although postmaster, business man, and large farmer, was also claimant for a share of the untenanted land, and refused to admit the small holders, labourers, or farmers' sons, to the number of twenty, whose right to a portion of untenanted land is acknowledged under the Act of 1905; can he say if this is the usual practice pursued by inspectors on such occasions; and whether the Estates Commissioners are prepared to sanction Mr. Booth's action.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners are aware that their inspector occupied a room in Mr. Cunningham's house on the occasion of his visit to the estate in question. The Commissioners see no reason to disapprove of the inspector's action in this respect. It is not the fact that the inspector refused to see the applicants referred to in the Question.

Boycotting in Ireland.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-

Lieutenant of Ireland what was the number of cases and of persons boycotted in Ireland on the last day of each month from February to September, inclusive, in the same form in which the information was given in Parliamentary Paper, No. 89, of the last session.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The number of cases of boycotting and of persons boycotted on the last day of the months named are as follows—

Date.	Wholly Boycotting.		Partial Boycotting.		Minor Boycotting.		Total number of all cases of Boycotting.
	Cases.	Persons.	Cases.	Persons.	Cases.	Persons.	Cases.	Persons.
1908:
29th February -	6	37	14	61	154	572	174	670
31st March - -	6	33	13	57	148	578	167	668
30th April - -	15	65	10	39	141	545	166	649
31st May . -	15	66	10	39	140	555	165	660
30th June - -	16	72	10	37	142	550	168	659
31st July - -	16	75	10	38	160	587	186	700
31st August - -	16	75	10	40	188	639	214	754

The figures for 30th September are not yet available.

Army Officers as Russian Interpreters.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that a recent Army Department notification offers encouragement to officers, who have qualified as Russian interpreters, by way of preference in respect of certain appointments; and whether the Government contemplates giving similar encouragement, or any encouragement, to civil officers, who are, or may in future become, similarly qualified.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) Presumably the hon. Member refers to a recent Indian Army Order creating an official staff of interpreters in Russian for Army purposes. The terms of that order do not admit of extension to civil officers, and the Secretary of State is not aware that the Government of India contemplates any similar arrangement for civilians who may possess, or hereafter acquire, a knowledge of Russian.

Indians in the Mauritius.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the statements of one Brindaban, a native of the Punjab, regarding the ill-treatment of Indian emigrants in the Mauritius; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the matter.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) I have seen the statements, but I have no reason to believe that they are accurate ; the Secretary of State will, however, bring them to the Governor's notice and invite his observations.

Consumption of Raw Cotton.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) : To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will state the number of pounds of raw cotton consumed respectively in the United Kingdom, the United States, and Germany during the years 1883 to 1887 and 1903 to 1907.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The following statement gives the information required by the hon. Member—

Years.	Estimated Consumption of Raw Cotton.
	In the United Kingdom.*	In the United States† (Years ended 30th June.)	In Germany.‡
	Million lbs.	Million lbs.	Million lbs.

* Net imports, i.e., total imports less re-exports.

† Total estimated consumption of cotton of domestic and foreign origin according to United States official returns.

‡ Imports for home consumption according to German official returns.

Imperial Postal Order System—Position of Canada and Australia.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) : To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Imperial Postal Order system now comprises practically the whole of the British Empire with the exception of Canada and Australia, and that it affords a convenient and cheap means of remitting small sums of money ; and whether he will state what are the difficulties in the way of exchanging postal orders between Great Britain and Canada and Australia.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have invited the Governments of Canada and Australia to participate in the Imperial Postal Order system, to which I called attention in my recent Annual Report in the terms quoted by the hon. Member. I am sorry to say that neither of those Governments has yet found itself able to adopt the system.

Postcard Postage Rates.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: To ask the Postmaster-General whether it is the fact that newspapers are conveyed from the United Kingdom to every part of the world for a maximum charge of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for two ounces; whether he will permit postcards to be transmitted to every part of the Empire for  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. each; what would be the estimated loss incurred by sending postcards for  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. each to every part of the British Empire; and what is the estimated number of postcards sent from Great Britain to our Dominions, Colonies, and Dependencies last year.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The prepaid rate of postage on newspapers not exceeding two ounces in weight for all places abroad is  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. I do not see my way to reduce the charge on postcards. The number of postcards despatched from the United Kingdom to the rest of the Empire last year is estimated at 2,650,000. The amount of loss entailed by the introduction of a half-penny rate would depend partly on the increase in the number of cards transmitted and on the percentage of such cards sent in lieu of letters. I have no information which enables me to frame a trustworthy estimate on these points.

Outdoor Poor Law Relief.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the President of the Local Government Board how many boards of guardians have increased their allowance to outdoor paupers of seventy years of age and upwards to 5s. per week since the passing of the Old-Age Pensions Act; and if he can state the cost of this increase to the Poor Law if made universal for paupers over seventy.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) Some boards of guardians have proposed to take the course indicated in the Question, but I cannot say how many of them have actually done so. If the increase in outdoor relief to 5s. a week to paupers over seventy years of age became universal in England and Wales it is estimated that the increased cost would amount to about £900,000 a year. I have, however, intimated to boards of guardians who have communicated with me on the subject that it would not be a proper exercise of their powers to order a fixed weekly sum as outdoor relief to all persons above a certain age to whom that form of relief is given. I have pointed out that the amount of relief in any particular case should be determined by the necessities of that case, and that although in some instances the conditions might be such that 5s. a week would be needed, in others this would not be so, and that in the latter cases the additional relief contemplated could not properly be given.

Pembroke Dockyard Joiners.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that when joiners are discharged from the Royal Dockyard at Pembroke a large and undue proportion of those discharged are men who are members of a trade union, the reason given being that they will receive 10s. per week from their trade society, whilst those that do not belong to a society will get nothing; and whether he will take steps to put a stop to this treatment of workmen who belong to a trade union.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) Inquiries are being made, and the reply to the hon. Member's Question will be circulated as soon as possible.

Channel Fleet Battleships.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many of the Channel Fleet's full complement of fourteen battleships have been assembled with the fleet for the present cruise since the date of starting; and whether he can state the numbers for each period up to the present moment.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) Six battleships from September 23rd to 26th; five from September 26th to October 5th; six from October 5th to October 12th; seven from October 12th to present time.

Bristol Army Boot Contract.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS (Wolverhampton, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state how many pairs of Army shoes have been produced in the City of Bristol and in the county of Northampton during the past five years.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)—

Quantities of Army Boots and Shoes ordered in Bristol and in the County of Northampton.

	Boots and Highland Shoes.		Canvas Shoes.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

New Zealand and Naval Defence.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware of the desire existing in the Dominion of New Zealand to assist in the problem of Imperial defence; and whether the request of the New Zealand Government for a vessel for the purpose of training young New Zealanders for the Navy will be acceded to.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The New Zealand Government were informed last May that the Admiralty had no suitable vessel available for transfer, but would be glad to give all possible assistance in the event of the New Zealand Government deciding to acquire one from the mercantile marine.

Naval Punishments.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what result has followed the issue of the Circular, headed "Summary Punishments—Birching and Caning," to which reference was made in the Debate on the Address on 21st February, 1906.

MR. McKENNA: No birchings have been inflicted since the new rules came into force; the effect on the total number of canings is not known.

Naval Pensions.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the fact that the pensions under the Old-Age Pensions Act are to be paid weekly; and whether he will give instructions for Navy pensioners to receive their pensions also at such periods.

MR. McKENNA: I have received memorials from 216 board of guardians on this subject, and as I stated to the House yesterday, I have come to the conclusion, after giving the fullest consideration to the representations made, that the balance of advantage lies with the present system of quarterly payments in advance. There are nearly 40,000 naval pensioners, and we believe that they form a highly-respectable class of the community, very few of whom are in the habit of receiving parochial relief. While willing to deal with individual cases on their merits, I am not prepared to deprive this large body of excellent citizens of an advantage which they at present enjoy and appreciate.

Territorial Yeomanry—Staff Sergeant-Majors.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Horton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state how many permanent staff sergeant-majors are employed in the Territorial Yeomanry; and what percentage of these non-commissioned officers have served abroad in the Regular Army.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): The establishment of permanent staff sergeant-majors in the Territorial Yeomanry is 280, and is complete. All these men are ex-Regulars. It is impossible to say how many have served abroad without calling for special returns from the record offices.

Indian Educational Changes.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether, following upon the resolutions of the Indian Universities Commission and the Indian Universities Act, new schemes are being introduced into the Indian educational system; whether such schemes in respect of Bengal provide for giving sufficient assistance to private indigenous colleges to enable them to comply with the demands of the new regulations imposed upon them by the University of Calcutta; and whether provision is made for training schoolmasters who teach in secondary schools through the medium of English.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): Various changes have been, and are being, made, but the Secretary of State has no knowledge of any intention on the part of the Government of Bengal to revise the present grant-in-aid rules, or of any applications for additional grants made by aided colleges in consequence of the new University regulations. A new scheme for the training of secondary school teachers is now being worked out by the Government of Bengal. The existing teachers, generally speaking, are men with a knowledge of English.

Mysore Government and Seditious Newspapers.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Government of Mysore has recently passed a regulation through its Legislative Council for dealing with seditious newspapers, providing that no newspaper in Mysore, shall be published without the written permission of the Government, that any person contravening this provision shall be required to leave Mysore within a week and not to return without permission, and providing also for forcible expulsion of the offender and confiscation of his press and his plant; and whether this Bill passed through a Legislative Council consisting of Indian gentlemen without a dissentient voice.

MR. BUCHANAN: No official report has been received, but I understand that the facts are as stated by the hon. Member; and a Regulation of the character in question has been passed by the Government of Mysore.

*MR. REES: Are there two Mysores in India, or is this the native State which, during the recent Budget debate, was held up as an example to the Government of India by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil?

MR. BUCHANAN: There is only one Mysore that I know of.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Will the Government follow its example in other respects?

*MR. REES: Do the Government propose to follow this example and govern India according to native ideas and ideals?

MR. BUCHANAN'S answer was inaudible.

Indian Military Charges.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether an additional charge of £300,000 has lately been imposed on the Indian revenues for the recruitment and training of British soldiers for service in India; and, if so, whether he can furnish any explanation of the circumstances under which this increase is being levied.

MR. BUCHANAN: It has been agreed that the payment by the India Office to the War Office for the recruitment and training of British soldiers for service in India shall be increased by £300,000 a year from 1st May, 1908. The revision of the scale of payment that had been in force from 1890 was undertaken in accordance with the recommendation contained in Paragraphs 270 and 289 of the Report of Lord Welby's Commission on Indian Expenditure. The decision which has been arrived at is the result partly of the Report of an Inter-Departmental Committee which sat under the presidency of Sir Robert Romer, and partly of a discussion between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War. The chief grounds for increasing the payment beyond the rate which was agreed to in 1890 are that the training period on which the charge has hitherto been calculated was inadequate, and that there has been an increase (involving additional outlay by the War Office) in the emoluments of young soldiers and in the number of drafts and reliefs annually sent to India.

SIR H. COTTON: Can the hon. Gentleman state what was the capitation grant before this increase was effected and what it is now?

MR. BUCHANAN: I cannot, off-hand.

SIR H. COTTON: Is this the case in which the Secretary of State assured the House that in any negotiations with the War Office that authority would find him a dragon in the path?

MR. BUCHANAN: I cannot accept responsibility for that quotation.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): Did the Government of India assent to this charge?

MR. BUCHANAN: There were two representatives of India upon the Committee, and the assent of the Government of India has, I think, been received.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): Is it proposed to lay on the Table the Report of the Committee on Army Charges?

MR. BUCHANAN was understood to reply in the negative.

DR. RUTHERFORD: May I also ask—

*MR. SPEAKER: I think any further Question had better be put on the Paper.

Conviction for Sedition in the Central Provinces.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the case of the editor of the Hari Kishore, in the Central Provinces, who has been sentenced to five years hard labour for reprinting from another journal matter declared to be seditious, and to the confiscation of the press where this newspaper was printed, although it was not the property of the editor; and whether he will make inquiries into the facts of this case with a view to the reversal or modification of the sentence.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Secretary of State is acquainted with the facts of this case. He is aware of no reason for taking the exceptional action suggested by the hon. Member.

SIR H. COTTON: Is it the fact that the article for publishing which the paper was prosecuted was a reprint of an editorial in the Calcutta Englishman?

MR. BUCHANAN: I have no information to that effect.

MR. KEIR HARDIE : Was the paper in which the article originally appeared prosecuted ?

MR. BUCHANAN : That I cannot say. The information we have is not to the effect stated in the Question.

SIR H. COTTON : Does the hon. Gentleman realise that prosecutions of this character cause bitter and envenomed feelings—

*MR. SPEAKER : That is a matter of opinion.

Reform of Indian Administration.

SIR H. COTTON : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether any steps have been taken, by the appointment of a Departmental Committee or otherwise, to frame the promised measures of reform in Indian administration ; and whether, if a Committee has been appointed, he can state the names of its members.

MR. BUCHANAN : The matter is under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council, but he is not in a position to make a statement on the subject.

*MR. REES : Will representatives of native ideas and ideals be included in this Committee ?

Calcutta Press and Sedition Trial.

SIR H. COTTON : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Bengal Government has sent out a circular notice to various Indian newspapers in Calcutta warning them that to re-publish incriminating articles in a sedition trial is spreading disaffection and will render them liable to prosecution for sedition, even if such re-publication be a true report of the proceedings in the trial ; and whether a similar notice has been served on Anglo-Indian newspapers which are in the habit of reproducing day by day the text of the articles upon which charges for sedition are being based.

MR. BUCHANAN : The Secretary of State has no official information on the subject, but he will inquire.

SIR H. COTTON : I shall be happy to supply the hon. Gentleman with information.

Military Charges on India.

DR. RUTHERFORD : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Committee on Army Charges has recommended an addition of £300,000 to the capitation charges paid by India to the War Office ; and whether he can say when the Report of the aforesaid Committee will be circulated amongst hon. Members of this House.

MR. BUCHANAN : I would refer the hon. Member to the Answer which I have just given to the hon. Member for East Nottingham. The Secretary of State does not propose to lay the Report upon the Table.

DR. RUTHERFORD : Will the House have an opportunity of discussing the Report ?

MR. BUCHANAN : That is not for me to decide.

East African Protectorate Land Board.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme) : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received proposals as to the land law from the Land Board of the East African Protectorate ; if so, what reply was sent, and when ; will he give Members an opportunity of seeing the Land Board's proposals and the reply from the Colonial Office ; and will he state the names and positions of the persons composing this Land Board.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby) : The Land Board of the East Africa Protectorate according to the latest Return consisted of the following official members : The Director of Agriculture, the Conservator of Forests, the Director of Surveys, the Land Officer and the Secretary for Native Affairs ; and the following unofficial members : Major Leggett, Messrs. Jones, Williams, Baillie, Cooper, Swift, Clarke, Flemmer, and Cushney. The functions of the Board are purely advisory. Certain proposals of the Board in regard to land legislation together with the reply of the Secretary of State will be found in Cd. 4117. Further communications have since been received, and will be included in Papers to be laid at a future date.

East African Protectorate Lands.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will issue to Members the instructions sent to the Governor of the East African Protectorate relative to the leasing of land to white settlers and the prohibition of freehold grants.

COLONEL SEELY: My hon. friend will find the instructions to which he refers in Lord Elgin's despatch of 19th March, presented to Parliament with other Papers as Cd. 4117 in June last. Paragraph 12 of that despatch limits grants of freehold to 320 acres.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies how many acres of land in East Africa were granted in freehold during the last year for which figures are available, and how many on ninety-nine years without revision of rent; and is it still possible to get freehold land in East Africa in spite of the instruction for guidance recently sent out by the Colonial Office.

COLONEL SEELY: The latest available figures in regard to grants of land in the East Africa Protectorate are those for the year ending 31st December, 1907, which my hon. friend will find in the Annual Report on the Protectorate for 1906-7, presented to Parliament as Cd. 3729. Instructions were given by Lord Elgin in March last that freehold grants should be limited to homesteads of 320 acres each, and I have no reason to think that these instructions are not being carried out. There may, however, be cases in which grants of larger areas are still being made on the ground that they had been promised before the receipt of these instructions.

MR. WEDGWOOD asked if the Land Board had any voice in the grants of 320 acres or was that a matter purely within the cognisance of the Colonial Office.

COLONEL SEELY: The decision of the Secretary of State in these cases is final, but the Land Board advises on other matters.

Ceylon Legislative Council.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the constitution of the Ceylon Legislative Council, which does not contain a single elected member; whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction which prevails in the island on account of this absence of representation; and whether His Majesty's Government will take into consideration the advisability of giving to Ceylon such an elective Legislative Council as other Crown Colonies possess and of appointing one or more Ceylonese to the Executive Council.

COLONEL SEELY: The Secretary of State does not propose to introduce changes in the constitution of Ceylon which, I may say, appears to give as much satisfaction as can reasonably be expected of any form of Government.

SIR H. COTTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that considerable dissatisfaction is expressed and felt in the island of Ceylon?

*MR. REES: In what manner has it been manifested?

COLONEL SEELY: I am aware that dissatisfaction is expressed with all Governments. I cannot say what amount of dissatisfaction is felt in this case: perhaps the hon. Member for East Nottingham can inform the hon. Member for Montgomery Boroughs.

Zulu Chief's Flogging.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Zulu chief Mabeketshiya, a British subject, was recently, while unconvicted and awaiting trial in Natal, subjected to a flogging of twenty lashes for refusing to perform the hard labour usually imposed only upon convicted prisoners; and, if so, whether he can state what law of the Colony warrants such punishment of a British subject before trial, and by what tribunal the sentence was passed.

COLONEL SEELY: Yes, Sir, the punishment was inflicted under martial law, as stated at page 184 of Cd. 3998. Later information with regard to the case will be found in further correspondence which will shortly be laid before Parliament.

Mr. MACKARNES: Is martial law still in existence in Natal?

COLONEL SEELY: No, Sir.

Labour in the New Hebrides.

Mr. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any steps have been taken to prevent natives being engaged for indentured labour under the New Hebrides Convention by persons of extra-European race.

COLONEL SEELY: I have to refer the hon. Member to Paragraph 14 of the despatch, printed on pages 33-39 of Cd. 3876 of 1907, from which he will see that some time ago instructions were given that no natives should be allowed to do the actual recruiting and engaging of labourers.

Lobita Bay Railway.

Mr. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what progress has been made with the railway, eastward from Lobita Bay, Western Africa; is it intended to make a connection with this line and that of the Rhodesian or other part of the railway system of British South Africa; is the gauge of the railway similar to that of the British South African system; and whether he has already secured, or in the future intends to secure, transit of goods in bond through to British territory.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY Northumberland, Berwick): According to the latest information received, about 215 kilometres of the line have been constructed. Nothing is known with regard to an eventual connection between the Lobito Bay Railway and the Rhodesian or other British South African lines. The gauge of the railway is similar to that of the Rhodesian lines. No arrangement has been made with regard to the transit of goods in bond through to British territory, as negotiations on this point, before the completion of the line and the publication of the tariff, would be premature.

Russo-Japanese War Echoes—British Shipping Claims.

Mr. G. H. FABER (Boston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs seeing that it is now more than a year since the Russian Government recouped the German shipowner for the sinking of the steamship "Tetartos," and that in no single instance has compensation been obtained for any British vessel destroyed by Russian warships, in defiance of International law, during the war in the East, will he say if the Russian Government claims a prescriptive right to sink British vessels on the high seas, and if such claim applies to British vessels alone.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The circumstances in which compensation was paid in the case of the German ship "Tetartos" were explained in the Answer given to the hon. Member on July 13th last, and His Majesty's Government have no reason for assuming that any other or different course will be followed in the cases of British ships in which the Russian Supreme Court of Appeal have found that the vessel was not liable to confiscation. Some of these cases are still pending before the Russian tribunals, but His Majesty's Government have done all in their power to expedite decisions. In one British case, that of the "Ikhona," the decision has been substantially the same as in that of the "Tetartos." The action of the Russian naval officers, in sinking certain neutral vessels of various nationalities during the hostilities with Japan, was taken in pursuance of Paragraph 21 of the Russian Naval Regulations published in the London Gazette of 18th March, 1904, which, though His Majesty's Government are unable to admit, the Imperial Government maintain are not inconsistent with generally recognised principles of International law. The Hague Conference disclosed a difference of opinion amongst the nations on this point, and it is one of the questions on which it is to be hoped some understanding will be reached with Maritime Powers at the Conference to be held in London towards the end of this year. There is, however, no ground for the suggestion that the right was claimed by Russia with regard to British vessels alone.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): May I ask, Sir, whether, considering the time that has elapsed, some real reason for some of these delays cannot be given to the House? I have raised the same question in reference to various other ships.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Some progress has been made. In one case, that of the "Ikhona," a satisfactory decision has been given, and in one or two others we are doing all we can to expedite matters, though I admit the progress is very slow.

Russian Officers in the Persian Army.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will make friendly representations to the Government of Russia with a view to recalling the Russian officers who are leading the Shah's troops against the Nationalists and in that way jeopardising the lives of Europeans.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I presume that the hon. Member refers to Tabriz. My information is to the effect that no Russian officers are to participate in the operations there.

DR. RUTHERFORD: Is it not the fact that Russian officers have been ordered to lead the Shah's troops to Tabriz?

SIR EDWARD GREY: My information is that their instructions are that they are not to take any part in the operations.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON: May I ask whether it is not the fact that certain Russian officers have been for years past in command of Persian troops in Teheran?

SIR EDWARD GREY: There have been for years certain Russian officers connected with a brigade of Cossacks at Teheran.

Old-Age Pension Regulations.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the amendment of Regulation 24 of the Old-Age Pensions Regulations, 1908, by enlarging the membership of sub-committees, having regard to the present system of grouping of boroughs for the purposes of the Act; and whether, in the event of there being a surplus from the Treasury grant in respect of the initial period, he will endeavour to arrange for such surplus to be carried forward for the purposes of the future administration of the Act, in addition to the sum provided by the Treasury scale.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I will answer this Question for my right hon. friend. Substantive Regulations under the Act are being signed to-day and will be issued this week in place of the provisional Regulations now in force. From these my hon. friend will see that his first point has been anticipated by the addition of a proviso to Regulation 24 permitting the Local Government Board in special circumstances to sanction either a greater or smaller number for the membership of a sub-committee. As regards the second point, I fear it would not be possible as a matter of accounting to carry forward balances in the manner suggested; but I will certainly cause a careful note to be taken of any savings which a pension committee may succeed in effecting out of the amounts placed at their disposal by the Treasury during the initial period for administrative expenses, and I will see that due credit is given them for their virtue, should the same committees find it necessary to come to the Treasury for indulgence on a future occasion.

Government Contracts and the Fair Wages Clause.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state when the Report of the Departmental Committee, appointed to consider the administration of the Fair Wages Clause, may be expected.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am informed that the Report will be completed in the course of a few days.

Paupers and Old-Age Pensions.

MR. McHUGH (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the number of persons of seventy years and upwards in England, Ireland, and Scotland, respectively, who are at present inmates of workhouses, and who have received outdoor relief since 1st January, 1908; and can he state the intentions of the Government as to an amendment of the Old Age Pensions Act in respect of such persons.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: As regards the first part of the Question, I understand from my right hon. friend, the President of the Local Government Board, that no precise information is available as to the number of persons over seventy years of age who are inmates of workhouses at the present time, or who have been recipients of outdoor relief since 1st January last. It has been estimated, however, that the number might be taken as 287,000, comprising 236,000 in England and Wales, 19,000 in Scotland, and 32,000 in Ireland. I should add that in this estimate the total number in workhouses and other Poor Law institutions has been taken at 77,000, and the number in receipt of outdoor relief at 210,000. As regards the latter part of the Question, I am not at present in a position to add anything to the very full statements which were made on behalf of the Government, when the Bill was under discussion in the House of Commons, respecting their policy with regard to disqualification on account of receipt of poor relief.

Hop Substitutes in Beer.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when the promised legislation to apply the Hop (Prevention of Frauds) Act to imported hops, and to prohibit the use of hop substitutes and chemical preservatives in beer, will be introduced.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: As I said in my reply of 27th July last to my hon. friend the Member for the Cirencester division of Gloucestershire, it is proposed to introduce at an early date a Bill to prohibit the use of hop substitutes in the brewing of beer in the United Kingdom, provided general assent is secured to put it through during the autumn session. The question of the marking of foreign hops will be dealt with at the same time.

Irish Land Act Finance.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is in a position to inform the House of the details of the scheme submitted to the Treasury by Sir Alexander Henderson to raise £40,000,000 at 2½ per cent. to relieve the present deadlock in land purchase in Ireland; whether the Treasury have accepted the proposal; and, if not, will he say why?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: No definite scheme for raising a sum of £40,000,000 at 2½ per cent. interest has been laid before the Treasury. Suggestions have indeed been made and discussed for the temporary raising of funds by the issue of short-dated securities which might be expected to command better terms than the guaranteed 2½ per cent. stock. But such proposals are open to the objection that they provide merely for a postponement of the present difficulties. Whether any ultimate advantage could be gained would depend upon the price at which stock might have to be issued when the time came for paying off the short securities.

Home Industries.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the event of the special protection granted to tobacco-growing in Ireland proving a success in promoting that industry he will extend protection to other home-grown commodities for a like purpose.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I can make no such promise. The slight financial encouragement given to tobacco-growing in Ireland would not justify the Government in taking measures which would hamper every other industry in the United Kingdom with protective duties.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central): Will a like advantage be extended to sugar-beet-growing in this country?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have promised sympathetic consideration to any definite proposals that may be made on that subject.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: And in the event of this experiment with tobacco proving a success will the system be extended to the flax-growing industry in the North of Ireland?

[No Answer was returned.]

Old-Age Pensions.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state for the area of each local pension committee the number of persons who have claimed an old-age pension under the provisions of the Old-Age Pensions Act, 1908.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am afraid that I am not yet in a position to answer the Question of the hon. Baronet; but, as I stated in the House yesterday, in answer to a Question put to me by my hon. friend the Member for Fulham, I have already called for a return of the total number of applications which have been received up to the present time.

Pension Officers.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Inland Revenue officers have been called upon to undertake the duties of pension officers; how many of these devote the whole of their official time to pension duties; and how many Inland Revenue officials, other than pension officers, are engaged on duties arising out of the Old-Age Pensions Act.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The number of Inland Revenue officers who have been called upon to undertake the duties of pension officer is approximately 1,660. It is not possible to say without full inquiry how many of these devote the whole of their official time to pension duties, but the number is not large—probably under 200. The number of Inland Revenue officials other than pension officers (and excluding collectors) who are engaged—in part—on duties arising out of the Old-Age Pensions Act is (as regards the Excise Branch), approximately, 290.

Old-Age Pension Regulations.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can state how many and which Departments have issued regulations or instructions with regard to the administration of the Old-Age Pensions Act; whether all these regulations or instructions will be laid upon the Table of the House; and, if so, when?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The regulations made by the Treasury in conjunction with the Local Government Board and the Postmaster-General and the Local Government Boards for Scotland and Ireland under Section 10 of the Old-Age Pensions Act (which have been in force as provisional regulations since 20th August last) are being signed to-day, and will be presented to both Houses of Parliament forthwith, in accordance with that section. Financial instructions to pension committees and sub-committees have been issued by the Treasury with regard to the expenses which may be incurred by them and the remuneration of their clerks. I will lay a copy of those on the Table. No other instructions have been issued, except by way of directions given by public Departments to their own officers. These I am not prepared, for reasons which I explained yesterday, to lay on the Table. Apart from the Regulations and Instructions, properly so-called, I understand that the Local Government Board (and also the Local Government Boards for Scotland and Ireland) have addressed advisory Memoranda to councils which are required by the Act to appoint pension committees. My right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board is, I understand, prepared to lay those issued to councils in England and Wales, and my right hon. friends the Secretary for Scotland and the Chief Secretary will no doubt take the same action with regard to the Scottish and Irish Memoranda, if they are asked to do so.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any instructions have been issued to the pension officers in connection with the Old-Age Pensions Act; whether such instructions were secret, and, if so, why; and whether it is proposed to lay such instructions upon the Table of this House.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Apart from the instructions to pension officers contained in the Second Schedule to the Regulations, the only instructions given to pension officers are directions of a Departmental character regulating the manner in which they are to discharge their official duties. Such directions necessarily contain a large amount of matter which it would not be in the interest of the public service to publish, and they are, in accordance with the general rule respecting Departmental instructions of this nature, to be regarded as confidential. For this reason, I am not prepared to lay particulars of the instructions which have been given upon the Table.

LORD R. CECIL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any instructions have been issued to pension officers directing them in estimating the means of a claimant not to take into consideration furniture to the value of £30; if so, under what powers such instructions were issued; and whether they intend to enable the Government of the day to make any other, and, if so, what, alteration in the conditions for a pension.

MR. HAROLD COX: At the same time may I ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Board of Inland Revenue has issued instructions to pension officers to deduct £30 from the value of furniture possessed by claimants for pensions, estimating the means of such claimants; and under what clause of the Act this deduction is authorised.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will, if my hon. friend the Member for Preston will permit, reply to this and the Question in similar terms in his name at the same time. Departmental instructions had been given to pension officers by the Board of Inland Revenue that in the preparation of their Reports upon the means of claimants they may disregard furniture and personal effects actually belonging to and used by the claimant, not exceeding £30 in value. This instruction has been given under the general powers which a public Department possesses to direct its own officers. It is, of course, in no way binding on the pension committees who, if they are dissatisfied with the report, are quite at liberty to refer it back to the pension officer for further investigation. The duty of estimating the means of a claimant rests, under the Act, not upon the pension officer but upon the committee, subject to appeal to the Local Government Board. It is thought, however, that it would be a waste of labour to conduct meticulous inquiries into the precise value of ordinary articles of furniture, household utensils and clothing in the possession of claimants in every case. Such information will, however, always be obtained if called for by the committee. The interpretation of Section 4 of the Act rests with the Committees, subject to appeal to the Local Government Board, and there is no intention on the part of the Government to prejudge questions which may arise under that section or to withhold from committees any information which they may deem to be necessary for the proper discharge of their statutory duties.

LORD R. CECIL: Are the pension officers bound to obey these instructions on pain of dismissal?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Certainly they are expected to obey the instructions given by the Board of Inland Revenue.

Gentleman has made by his instructions would clearly have been out of order and could not have been made by the other House, may I ask if the right hon. Gentleman claims, as a Minister of the Crown, to make modifications in an Act of Parliament which the House cannot now consider?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not agree with the noble Lord as to the interpretation of the Act. These instructions are purely a liberal, fair and, I think, commonsense interpretation.

MR. HAROLD COX asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the instructions to the pension officers were to take into account all food and clothing, and whether it was more meticulous to take into account all furniture than all food and clothing.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am not sure to what my hon. friend is referring. If he will refer me to the section I will see.

MR. HAROLD COX: I refer to the instructions already published in the Daily Telegraph.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.) asked whether the Government had been informed by the noble Lord that it was his intention to assist in removing this restriction making it necessary to give these instructions to the pension officer.

LORD R. CECIL asked the Prime Minister whether he would give any opportunity to discuss this very serious invasion of the rights of the House.

Royal Warrant Holders.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will ascertain and communicate to the House of Commons the nature of the steps taken by the heads of the various Departments of the Royal Household through which warrants are granted to insure observance of the particulars clause and other provisions of the Factory and Health Laws.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland): As my right hon. friend pointed out to the hon. Member on 9th July, firms holding Royal Warrants are subject to the same regulations and inspection as other firms. The due observance of the provisions of the Factory Acts is a matter for the Home Office, and not for the Departments of the Royal Household.

Motor Vehicle Smoke Nuisances.

MR. MACKARNESS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any instructions are given to the police in London to take proceedings to check the growing nuisance to the public from the reckless discharge of oil smoke by motor vehicles; and in how many cases have prosecutions been instituted within the last twelve months, and with what results.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: As my right hon. friend stated in reply to a Question on this subject from the hon. Member on 2nd June last, the Metropolitan Police can and do take disciplinary action in the case of motor cabs and motor omnibuses discharging oil smoke, since a condition of their licensing is that: "the lubrication of the engine or the carburation of the working mixture must be so controlled that smoke is not projected with the exhaust, or from any other part." But in the present state of the law, legal proceedings cannot successfully be taken against drivers of motor vehicles where the emission of smoke is due to any temporary or accidental cause, which my right hon. friend understands is practically always the case.

MR. MACKARNESS asked how many prosecutions have been instituted.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL replied that he was not aware if there were any actual prosecutions, but in 1906 over 300 omnibuses were reported for emitting smoke, and in 1907 over 150. These would not be allowed to be used again until the defects had been remedied.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) asked whether the power to prosecute was limited to licensed vehicles.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL asked for notice.

Middlesex Sessions Sentences.

MR. W. THORNE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the sentences passed by Sir Ralph Littler at the September Middlesex Sessions upon two labourers, one aged twenty-one, who had stolen apples to the value of 1s., was sentenced to three years penal servitude and two years police supervision, and another labourer, aged forty, was sentenced to twelve months hard labour for stealing three penny eggs; and whether he can see his way to have the sentences reduced.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: My right hon. friend is making inquiry with regard to these cases, but I would remind the hon. Member that under the Criminal Appeal Act of last year a prisoner convicted on indictment can apply to the Court of Criminal Appeal for leave to appeal against his sentence if he alleges that it is excessive.

*MR. REES: Will the right hon. Gentleman also inquire whether these labourers were taking the advice of the hon. Member for West Ham?

A LABOUR MEMBER: That is very cheap.

MR. W. THORNE: I wish some of them would.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): In view of the severity, not to say brutality, of the sentences inflicted by this magistrate, cannot the Home Secretary pension him off as soon as possible?

*MR. G. D. FABER (York): Was the labourer, aged forty, who was sentenced to twelve months hard labour found guilty of robbing a hen-roost?

Lieutenant-Colonel Ley and the Cat.

MR. G. GREENWOOD (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that on 24th September last Lieutenant-Colonel W. G. Ley, commanding the 1st North Staffordshire Regiment, was charged before the justices at Aldershot with cruelty to a cat; that the justices found that the case had been proved, but nevertheless declined to convict; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: My right hon. friend's attention has been called to the case but he has no power to interfere.

*MR. G. GREENWOOD: Did the magistrates in this case act under the Probation of Offenders Act, and, if so, did they decline to convict on the ground that the case was a trivial one?

*MR. SPEAKER: The Home Office are not responsible for the decisions of the magistrates.

Police Protection in England.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state the number of persons at present under police protection, special and by patrol, in England.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: My right hon. friend regrets that it is impossible to give this information.

Inquiry into Factory Accidents.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when an announcement will be made regarding the Committee to be appointed to inquire into accidents in factories.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I hope in the course of a few days.

Drury Lane Performing Horse.

MR. CARR-GOMM (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been drawn to the stage representation of a horse falling from a precipice which is being shown at Drury Lane theatre; and whether the Home Office inspector has satisfied himself that there is no ill-treatment of this horse in the performance.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Theatres are not under Home Office inspection, but my right hon. friend has made inquiry into this matter, and he learns that the measures taken are such that there is no ill-treatment of the horse.

Accidents through Motor Traffic.

MR. MACKARNESS: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state how many accidents arising from motor traffic throughout England and Wales have been reported to the police during the months of June, July, and August in 1907 and 1908, respectively; and in how many cases those accidents have been fatal.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to answer this Question on behalf of my right hon. friend. The police throughout England and Wales have been asked to forward at the end of this year a Return for the period from 1st May to 31st December, 1908, of all accidents in streets, roads or public places, which have come to their knowledge, caused by motor or horse-drawn vehicles respectively, resulting in death or personal injury. Figures for last year could not be collected.

Railway Companies' Agreements.

MR. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the action of certain railway companies in entering into agreements and arranging to pool receipts; and whether, in view of the provisions of the Acts of Parliament establishing these railways and of the danger which would result from the formation of a gigantic railway trust or series of trusts, the Government propose to take any, and if so, what action.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): This matter has engaged my attention; I am informed that the most far-reaching of the arrangements proposed, namely, that of the Great Central, Great Eastern, and Great Northern Companies will be embodied in a Bill and submitted to Parliament for approval. As to other arrangements which are being entered into by various companies, and which do not, in the opinion of those companies, require Parliamentary or other sanction, my hon. friend may rest assured that the working of such arrangements will be most carefully watched, and should experience show that they operate detrimentally to the public interest, His Majesty's Government would not hesitate to take or to propose to Parliament the measures required by the situation.

MR. WARDLE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that under Section 17 of the Act of 1844 he has full power to deal with this matter?

MR. CHURCHILL: I am making very careful inquiries. I shall, of course, watch very carefully over any powers which may be in the possession of the President of the Board of Trade under the law, and also if any opportunity arises conveniently for putting them into force.

MR. H. C. LEA: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the action of the railway companies referred to in this matter has sensibly added to the unemployment which is existing in the country, and especially in my own constituency?

MR. CHURCHILL: I am not familiar with the circumstances mentioned by the hon. Member.

Midland Railway Friendly Society.

MR. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Midland Railway Company are compelling a large number of their platelayers, who are from thirty to forty years of age, and who have been many years in the employ of the company, now to join the Midland Friendly Society although many of them are already members of other friendly societies; and, if so, whether, as the company did not exercise their prerogative under the Midland Friendly Society's Act, he will take the matter up.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Board of Trade have no information on this subject, but I understand that the Midland Railway Friendly Society comes within the purview of the Departmental Committee now considering the superannuation and similar funds of railway companies. I would suggest that the hon. Member should bring the matters to which his Question refers to the notice of that Committee.

MR. HUDSON: Is not this a matter of administration, seeing that this friendly society got its powers by Act of Parliament? Will the right hon. Gentleman see that the men do not suffer?

MR. CHURCHILL suggested that the best thing would be for the hon. Member to put the case before the Committee which was now investigating the Question. If, however, there was any element of urgency perhaps the hon. Member would communicate with him privately.

MR. WARDLE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these men are being discharged now if they do not join this particular fund?

Strangford Bar Lights.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade how many vessels have been wrecked in the vicinity of Strangford Bar, County Down, during the past two months, and the approximate value of the loss sustained; and what progress, if any, has been made towards lighting that dangerous part of the Irish coast.

MR. CHURCHILL: Two vessels have stranded in this vicinity during the last two months, of which one floated off without assistance, while the other—a Swedish vessel—became a wreck. In addition to these, four vessels have stranded off other parts of County Down, South of Donaghadee, one becoming a wreck. I cannot say what the value of the loss will prove to be. The Board of Trade have sanctioned an expenditure of £1,000 on the establishment of a whistle buoy carrying a white acetylene light off the entrance of Strangford Lough. The Commissioners of Irish Lights state that as the establishment of this buoy may take some time they are meanwhile having an ordinary lighted sounding buoy placed on the selected position with the least possible delay.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Can the right hon. Gentleman indicate even roughly how long it will be before the light is provided?

MR. CHURCHILL: There will be the least possible delay, but I cannot say what that phrase means in the case of the Irish Lights Board.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: We have now been trying to get it for three years. Surely it is time something was done?

MR. CHURCHILL: Well, an expenditure of £1,000 has been sanctioned, and pending the completion of the whistling buoy a temporary buoy is to be placed there.

Derelicts on the High Seas.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the United States Government have decided to place in commission a special vessel for the destruction of derelicts on the high seas; and whether, having regard to the danger which these derelicts constitute to navigation, he will represent to His Majesty's Government the desirability of fitting out a British vessel for similar work on this side of the Atlantic.

MR. CHURCHILL: I have seen a statement in the newspapers that the United States Government have decided to establish a special vessel for the purpose of destroying floating derelicts on the high seas. The question of dealing with floating derelicts was very fully considered by a Committee in 1894. That Committee reported to the effect that the danger from collision with derelicts in the open sea is very small, that the chance of discovering such derelicts would be infinitesimal; that the destruction of certain classes of derelicts when found is a work of great difficulty and might create additional dangers; and that the cost of such an undertaking would be out of all proportion to any possible benefit. Having regard to the Report of the Committee I am not prepared to recommend the fitting out of a vessel for the destruction of derelicts.

Hop Industry Labour.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board how many persons are estimated to have been employed as labourers and as pickers in the hop industry this year and in previous years; and whether so great a decrease in the number of persons employed in this industry has taken place in any previous year.

MR. CHURCHILL: I regret that I have no further statistical information upon this subject than that referred to in my reply to the hon. Member's Question on 18th February last.

Postal Revenue from Limericks.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that the recent increase of profits upon postal orders is mainly due to Limerick competitions, and having regard to the fact that such competitions have now been declared by the High Court to have been lotteries, he proposes to retain, for the purposes of the public service, the profits made by his Department in connection with such lotteries.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I have no right to inquire the purpose for which postal orders are bought, nor to abandon any revenue derived from their sale.

MR. BOTTOMLEY: Has not the right hon. Gentleman himself publicly stated that the profit arising from these postal orders was largely due to Limerick competitions?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: What I said was that there had been a very considerable increase in the sale of postal orders and a corresponding addition to the revenue of the Post Office.

Dutch Milk Frauds.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General whether he is now in a position to say what steps, if any, have been, or will be, taken to institute further proceedings against Messrs. Cleeve Brothers for selling Dutch condensed milk under a description calculated to convey that the product was Irish.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields): It is not intended to take any further proceedings in this case. Such proceedings if taken would be by way of special case, setting out the facts as found by the learned magistrate. On those facts, as the magistrate was prepared to state them, those concerned in the case are of opinion that an appeal would not succeed, and I do not feel justified in differing from them.

Ennistymon Disturbances.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that forty-three young men from Doolan, Tolea, and Lisdoonvarna, having been summoned to attend the Petty Sessions Court at Ennistymon, were quietly walking into Ennistymon to attend the Sessions when they were set upon by a body of police and batoned, many persons being seriously injured; and whether he will have a sworn inquiry into the conduct of the district inspectors and police who committed this attack.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The police authorities inform me that on 30th September a case of cattle-driving was heard at Ennistymon Petty Sessions. On the morning of that day, and before the hearing, an organised procession approached the village, carrying a banner inscribed: "Down with the landlords," and accompanied by a band playing music. The police repeatedly requested the party to take down the banner, and warned them that band playing would not be allowed in the vicinity of the courthouse. The crowd ignored the warnings of the police, and attempted to force their way into the village. Upon being prevented, they attacked the police with sticks and stones, and several policemen were injured. The police thereupon dispersed the crowd by a baton charge, and took possession of the banner and two drums. After the case had been disposed of by the Court, a crowd collected outside the courthouse, and again attacked the police with stones, and this crowd also was dispersed by baton charges. It was the duty of the police to preserve order in the vicinity of the courthouse, and this duty appears to have been effectively discharged. I do not propose to hold any inquiry into the matter.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether there was anything illegal in exhibiting a banner bearing the words: "Down with the landlords," and whether several local clergymen protested strongly against the action of the police, and that their version of what happened was entirely different from that of the police themselves.

MR. BIRRELL: There are always disputes about such matters. I have stated the account given by the police, and as to its accuracy I have no reason to doubt it.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then I will call attention to the matter at an early date, and point out that the word of a priest is at least as good as that of a policeman.

Ballinamallard Evicted Tenant.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application from Mrs. Mary Fyffe, of Curran, Ballinamallard, County Fermanagh, to be restored as an evicted tenant; if so, have they put her on the list as a suitable person; and have the Estates Commissioners acquired in County Fermanagh any untenanted land or other land suitable for the restoration of evicted tenants under the Evicted Tenants Act or otherwise.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have received the application referred to, and have noted it for consideration when allotting untenanted land. The Commissioners have already acquired 140 acres of untenanted land in County Fermanagh, and are negotiating for the purchase of other lands. They have also initiated proceedings for the compulsory purchase of 338 acres in the county under the Evicted Tenants Act.

County Cork Evicted Tenants.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of evicted tenants in Cork County who have applied to the Estates Commissioners for reinstatement; how many have been restored to their former holdings or provided for on lands purchased by the Commissioners; what number still remain to be reinstated or provided with other farms on lands acquired or to be acquired; and what is the extent of the lands in the county for the purchase of which the Commissioners are in negotiation.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have received 1,043 applications from County Cork, of which 574 have been refused after investigation. One hundred and twenty-two applicants have been reinstated or provided with new holdings, and 208 applications have been noted for consideration in connection with the allotment of untenanted land. The remaining 139 applications were received since 1st May, 1907, and therefore have not yet been inquired into. The Commissioners are negotiating for the purchase of 11,416 acres of untenanted land in the county.

Grehan Estate (Cork) Evicted Tenants.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will ascertain whether the Estates Commissioners are aware that Mr. John J. Therry, junior, Mooresfort, County Tipperary, would be disposed to surrender the evicted farms he is in possession of on the Grehan estate, County Cork, for the purpose of the reinstatement of the evicted tenants on that estate; if the Commissioners would provide him with land of equivalent value elsewhere; and whether inquiry will be made into this matter.

MR. BIRRELL: As I have already informed the hon. Member, Mr. J. J. Therry is judicial tenant of the farms in question. The Estates Commissioners are not aware that Mr. Therry is willing to surrender the farms on being provided with land elsewhere, but they are prepared to consider any representation to that effect which he may make to them.

Police Protection in Ireland.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of persons at present under police protection, special and by patrol, in Ireland.

MR. BIRRELL: On 30th September, 104 persons were receiving constant police protection in Ireland, and 252 were receiving protection by police patrols.

Crime in Ireland.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of outrages in which firearms were used, cattle-drives, boycotting, and other cases of intimidation which were brought under the notice of the police since the House rose, and the number of persons convicted.

MR. BIRRELL: During the period in question twenty-seven offences were committed in which firearms were used, and in three of the cases persons are awaiting trial. The number of cattle-drives was seventy, and in respect of these cases fifty-six persons were ordered to find bail, of whom forty-seven were committed to prison in default of giving bail. Twelve other persons are awaiting trial upon charges of riot and unlawful assembly. There were five cases of intimidation, in one of which proceedings are pending. On 31st August there were sixteen cases in which persons were wholly boycotted, ten cases of partial boycotting, and 188 cases of minor boycotting.

Kerry Evicted Tenants.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of the resolution passed by the Kerry County Committee of Agriculture on 21st September with reference to the cases of evicted tenants in the County Kerry; and whether effect will be given to the terms of the resolution.

MR. BIRRELL: I have received a copy of the resolution in question, and have referred it to the Estates Commissioners, who inform me that they are taking all possible measures to effect the reinstatement of evicted tenants.

Exhibitions for Gaelic.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the resolution of the education committee of the Gaelic League, which has been forwarded to the Intermediate Board, requesting that the addendum to Rule 49 be varied so that the exhibitions assigned be allotted in proportion to the number entering for examination in each division, or that the division of the literary course be abolished; and whether effect will be given to this resolution.

MR. BIRRELL: I am informed that the resolution in question is being considered by the Intermediate Education Board at their meeting to-day.

Phoenix Park Police Depot.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the existing strength of the police force at the Phoenix Park depot; what proportion of the force is effective for duty in the country should it be considered necessary to further augment local establishments; and whether the 750 men by which the strength of the force generally has been supplemented during the past twelve months have all been recruited.

MR. BIRRELL: The existing strength of the force at the Royal Irish Constabulary Depot and sub-depot is 764 men, including 179 Reserve and 535 recruits. The majority of the Reserve men and 70 of the recruits are immediately available for duty in the country if required. The remaining recruits are in various stages of training. All the 750 men by which it was decided to increase the force, have been recruited.

Dungiven School Teacher.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.) On behalf of the hon. Member for North Armagh, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if Mr. John Harrington, late National School teacher at Dungiven, has been dismissed by the Roman Catholic priest of Dungiven, the Rev. E. Loughrey, and, if so, on what grounds; and will he say if Mr. Harrington has any appeal against such dismissal.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that on 19th July last, the Rev. Mr. Loughrey, who is the manager of the Dungiven Boys' School, notified the appointment of a new teacher in the place of Mr. John Harrington who had resigned on 29th April.

Galway Extra Police Charges.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Tuam Rural District Council have decided to postpone carrying out necessary public works on the ground that next year they would have thrown upon the district £13,000 or £14,000 for extra police and cattle-driving claims; and whether he will state when he proposes to take effectual measures to suppress practices which impose such heavy charges upon the ratepayers.

MR. BIRRELL: The Tuam Rural District Council is reported to have postponed the consideration of certain proposals for works because of the charge for extra police. There are at present 350 extra police in County Galway, and the charge upon the county at large is at the rate of about £12,000 per annum. I understand that about one-sixth of the total falls upon the Tuam Rural District. The Government are taking all possible measures within the ordinary law for the suppression of disorder. The extra police force will be removed as soon as the condition of the county warrants the adoption of that course.

Government Unemployment Proposals.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to indicate the nature of the practical legislative proposals of the Government on the subject of unemployment; and when he proposes to present them to Parliament.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): No, Sir. As I said yesterday I hope to make a statement next week.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Has the Prime Minister's attention been called to a speech made by the President of the Local Government Board at Tynemouth last night, in which he stated that he believed no legislation dealing with the unemployed question would be introduced? I should like further to ask—

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice had better be given of the Question.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Can the Prime Minister say on what day his statement will be made? In view of the urgency of the question, can he say definitely whether it will be made on Monday?

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot say that it will be on Monday. It will be early next week.

Motor Traffic Dangers.

MR. MACKARNESS: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the feeling which has been evoked in all parts of the country by the injury and danger to life and property caused by the abuses of the motor traffic and the failure of the existing law to deal with those abuses, His Majesty's Government will take steps to amend the Motor Car Act of 1903.

MR. ASQUITH: There can be no doubt that considerable feeling has been aroused in many places by the inconsiderate driving of motor cars, and representations have been made to the Local Government Board on the subject. On 19th September last, the Board issued a circular to local authorities drawing attention to the provisions of the Act of 1903, and impressed upon the authorities the importance of the enforcement of the law. I hope that the effect of this circular may be to bring about a more systematic enforcement of the law, but my hon. friend may be sure that the matter will not be lost sight of.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland) asked if steps could not be taken to prevent these abuses by persons in high places who continually set the law at defiance?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

Select Committee on the Hop Industry.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister when a day will be given for the discussion of the Report of the Select Committee on the Hop Industry.

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid that I cannot make any promise of a day for the discussion of this Committee's Report.

MR. HAROLD COX: Will the right hon. Gentleman ascertain from the Committee whether hops are or are not raw material?

Irish Land Purchase Deputation.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will receive the joint deputation, representing the landowners and tenants of the South of Ireland, which was appointed at the recent meeting in Cork to lay before the Ministry their views as to the threatened deadlock in land purchase.

MR. ASQUITH: I have been invited to receive the deputation mentioned in the Question, but after giving the request my best consideration, I have come to the conclusion that no useful purpose could be served by my doing so. The Government are already acquainted with the views of the persons who would compose the deputation, and we shall be prepared within a very short time to state to the House our proposals, which can then be advantageously considered on their merits. I need not say that we shall always be glad to receive and consider any representations that may be offered to us by hon. Gentlemen opposite on matters like this which specially affect Irish interests.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN asked the Prime Minister whether he could name any precedent for this refusal to give even a hearing to a deputation in the highest degree representative of all parties and all classes in the south of Ireland upon a question of the most vital moment to the future of that country. Did the right hon. Gentleman seriously suggest that speeches delivered at a public meeting were to be accepted in lieu of the detailed and reasoned arguments the deputation were prepared to submit to him?

MR. ASQUITH: I am sorry to say that in the existing practice and in the state of expectation which at present prevails, I should spend the whole of my time receiving deputations if I were to accede to every request made. I do not in the least undervalue the importance or representative character of the deputation referred to, but I can assure the hon. Member that we are fully in possession of their views and are giving them the most careful and respectful consideration.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN asked the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his decision in view of the fact that within two or three weeks the operation of this Act practically came to an end, and that the prospects of peace in Ireland would come to an end with it; also whether in view of the declarations of all the Liberal leaders in 1903, published that morning the right hon. Gentleman would give some reasonable facilities for discussing the question before the Ministry came to a very likely to a hostile decision upon it.

Would the right hon. Gentleman give a couple of hours for the discussion?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; the Government will state their proposals within a short time, and then, no doubt, there will be opportunities for subsequent discussion; but I cannot anticipate.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I can only give notice that if these proposals are of a nature to smash the agreement of 1903, I for one, will throw the responsibility on those who propose them.

MR. WALTER LONG: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any idea of the time when he will be able to make the statement? There is very great anxiety throughout the whole of Ireland as to this very urgent question.

MR. ASQUITH: The statement will not be made by me in any case, but by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by the Chief Secretary. There will be, however, no avoidable delay. If the right hon. Gentleman will put down a question for Monday I will see about it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) asked whether the Prime Minister had not consented to receive that day a deputation from the Scottish National and Denominational Temperance Associations, and whether the interests involved there were not much smaller than in the Irish question.

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, I did receive a deputation to-day from Scotland, but I cannot assent to my hon. friend's description of it.

Irish Licensing Laws.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the number of licensed public-houses per head of the population is much greater in Ireland than in England, that there is no provision for reduction of the number of licences in Ireland, that till very recently the number was constantly and enormously increased, and that the licensing laws are chaotic and badly enforced; and does the Government propose to introduce any general measure of licensing reform for Ireland in the next session of Parliament.

MR. ASQUITH: The hon. Gentleman is quite correct in saying that the number of licensed houses per head of the population is much greater in Ireland than in England, and that there is no special provision for the reduction of licences such as exists here. Since 1901, up to which year there had been a slight progressive increase in the number of publicans' licences, there has been a small but steady decline in the numbers annually issued. My right hon. friend the Chief Secretary has expressed a hope that licensing legislation for Ireland will not be long delayed; but the Government cannot at the moment make any pledges with regard to such legislation for next session.

*MR. PATRICK WHITE (Meath, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that the Licensing Bill for Ireland will not proceed on the same lines as the English Bill?

MR. ASQUITH: I can say nothing as to that.

Mr. Churchill's Dundee Speech on Home Rule.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the statement of the President of the Board of Trade at Dundee on 9th October on the subject of Home Rule was made with the sanction of the Cabinet; and, if so, will a Bill be introduced dealing with the matter before the present Government go to the country.

MR. ASQUITH: Owing to the pressure of other duties, I have not been able to read the statements made by the President of the Board of Trade.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I shall repeat the Question on Monday.

Electric Lighting Bills.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) asked whether, in view of the importance of the private Bills dealing with the supply of electricity, it would not be possible to come to some arrangement whereby they could be considered at a quarter-past eight and not at eleven o'clock at night. He also asked whether a day could not be set apart for dealing with some other very important but non-contentious measures.

MR. ASQUITH said that he was quite disposed to agree with the right hon. Gentleman it would not be satisfactory to take these Bills after eleven o'clock, and he would consider whether an arrangement could be made which would admit of these important Private Bills being taken at the time customary for private business. Perhaps he might be excused giving a definite answer until communications had taken place through the ordinary channels.

MR. GRAYSON ORDERED TO WITHDRAW.

At the conclusion of Questions—

MR. GRAYSON (Yorkshire, W.R., Colne Valley) said: I rise to move that this House do immediately adjourn to consider a matter of urgent public importance. I refer to the question of the unemployed.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that no Motion for the Adjournment of the House is possible under the Resolution which the House passed. When the Licensing Bill stands first upon the Orders a Motion for the Adjournment may not be made, but it is open to the hon. Member to make it on any day when the Licensing Bill does not stand as first Order.

MR. GRAYSON: In the circumstances I feel—the crisis of unemployment is so great, when people are starving at this moment in the streets—that we must ignore those rules.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the House is bound by the restrictions which the House itself made.

MR. GRAYSON: Then I must personally refuse to be bound by such rules. It is all very well for you well-fed men to shout "Sit down," but I will not, and I decline to be a party to the Licensing

Bill taking up the attention of the House while the people are demanding human legislation.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to resume his seat while I am standing.

MR. GRAYSON: With all deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I cannot possibly sit down in this House to allow discussion, in the ordinary routine way, to go on. I feel too much my duty.

*MR. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. Gentleman refuses to sit down when I rise?

MR. GRAYSON: Well, Sir, if you rise to give me an explanation I will sit down, but I refuse to sit down while the next business is called in this House. With all respect—[Cries of "Order," on both sides of the House.]

*MR. SPEAKER: I have given the hon. Gentleman, with every courtesy, the explanation of the circumstances which prevent him, under the Rules the House itself has passed, from raising the question he desires to raise at the present moment, and I have pointed out to him that possibly another opportunity may occur for him to raise it. I would suggest to him that he should wait until that day arises, when he will be able to raise the question.

MR. GRAYSON: But in the intermediate period people are starving, and I feel this is a matter which one must insist upon. [Cries of "Order" and "Sit down."]

MR. GRAYSON: I refuse to sit down.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman persists, I must ask him to discontinue his speech.

MR. GRAYSON: I feel I cannot discontinue my speech.

*MR. SPEAKER: Then I must ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw from the House.

MR. GRAYSON: If you send your machinery of force to move me I will go.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman will not withdraw of his own accord I must ask the Serjeant-at-Arms to remove him.

MR. GRAYSON: I am willing to leave the House, because I feel degraded in a company that will not consider the unemployed. I believe that I have the unemployed mandate behind me asking for legislation from the House at this moment. [Cries of "Withdraw" and "Order."] Oh, yes, you well-fed human beings can say "Order, but the unemployed have been goaded into disorder. I refuse absolutely to be bullied into silence.

*MR. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. Member declines to withdraw?

MR. GRAYSON: I absolutely refuse to be bullied into silence.

*MR. SPEAKER: Serjeant-at-Arms, will you kindly remove the hon. Member?

MR. GRAYSON: I leave the House with pleasure. You are traitors to your class. You will not stand up for your class. You traitors.

The hon. Member then withdrew.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Members from Standing Committee A (in respect of the Tuberculosis (Ireland) Bill): Mr. Attorney-General, Mr. Secretary Gladstone, Mr. Herbert Samuel, and Colonel Seely; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Birrell, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Solicitor-General for Ireland, and Dr. Cooper.

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee; That they had added to a Standing Committee A the following Fifteen Members (in respect of the Tuberculosis (Ireland) Bill): Mr. Walsh, Mr. Cullinan, Mr. William Redmond, Mr. O'Malley, Mr. Nannetti, Mr. Nolan, Mr. Hazleton, Sir John Tuke, Mr. Gulland, Mr. Glendinning, Mr. Sloan, Captain Craig, Mr. Fetherstonhaugh, Mr. Hugh Barrie, and Mr. Robert Price.

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee B (in respect of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Bill): Sir Edward Strachey; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Munro Ferguson.

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee; That they had added to Standing Committee B the following Fifteen Members (in respect of the Criminal Appeal (Amendment) Bill [Lords]): Mr. John Taylor, Mr. Vivian, Mr. Hills, Mr. Walter Guinness, Mr. Abel Smith, Viscount Morpeth, Lord Willoughby de Eresby, Sir John Dickson-Poynder, Mr. Ryland Adkins, Mr. Bateman Hope, Mr. Alden, Mr. Barran, Mr. Montagu, and Sir John Dewar.

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee C (in respect of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) (No. 2) Bill): Mr. Rees; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. David Davies.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3:

*MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) moved the omission of subsection (1). That subsection really contained the whole essence of the Bill. All the iniquity, as they on that side of the House thought it, of the Bill was concentrated in this subsection. It was so opposed, in his opinion, to common justice between man and man that he could not imagine any moderate-minded man who would support it. He could not believe that the many moderate men who sat on the benches opposite could really in their hearts approve of it. The only class that he could think honestly approved of it would be perhaps the Socialists who denied the legal existence of private property, or the fanatics who might possibly argue that the importance of the end to be acquired justified any means for obtaining that end. In the whole course of this Bill, this amazing offspring of so-called Liberalism, there was no more vicious section than the one whose omission he was now moving. By it the State proposed to rob the individual—he used the word “rob” purposely, because he was sure it was the right one—of property acquired in all honesty and innocence, of property the existence of which the State had always recognised, and the value of which the State had always taxed. By this subsection, at the end of a period of fourteen years, all the value of licences existing at that time would disappear so far as the private owners of those licences were concerned. The value of that loss to the individual was perhaps rather difficult to assess accurately, but right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Government benches put it so high as £300,000,000 as recently as 1904, and it had dwindled down in their estimation by various stages till finally, when large figures became very inconvenient, it reached the moderate sum of £65,000,000. The exact figure did not concern him for the moment. It was in any case an enormous mass of property, the existence of which would come summarily to a close at the end of the period if this subsection passed. At the end of that period the applicant for renewal, as it was now called, of a licence would have in the first place to pay full monopoly value for that licence. He would have to give notice of his application, which he had not to do at present; he would have to submit to any fresh conditions that the licensing justices might think fit to impose, conditions to which he was not subject at present; he would not receive any written notice of objection to a renewal, as he now received; the evidence that could be heard against a renewal

need not be on oath, and there would be no appeal. All those changes in procedure were, he submitted, imposing a very great hardship indeed on those who conducted the business of licensed premises in this country, but it was not so much with the details of the procedure and the inconvenience of the proposed procedure, as to the financial question that he was concerned. The owners of these licences had to contribute, for fourteen years, or whatever the period might be, compensation for the extinctions of other licences, and at the end of that time they themselves would be extinguished without compensation at all, and the monopoly value, which they at present rightly and equitably possessed, would lapse into the hands of the State. The monopoly value had been estimated at so large a sum as £19,000,000 per annum. At all events, without in any way connecting himself with the definite figure, he was well within the mark when he said that many millions which were annually the property of the private individual would in future be annexed by this clause and become the property of the State. No possible justification for such a course as this could be found unless the present holders of these licences held them without any legal or moral right. But they had been bought in the open market; they had been bought and sold quite honestly, and as between individual and individual the right of property in them was certainly well established and just. As to the question as between the State and the individual, there again he thought it was clear that the right of the individual to the property in these licences was well established. They had been recognised by the Courts of the country; they had been held as good security for mortgages—mortgages based not on the value of the buildings, but on the value of the licensed buildings. They had been considered good security for debenture issues, issues of stock which had always been looked upon as trust stock, and in which trustees had for many years been in the habit of investing the money placed in their hands. In every possible way the Courts and the Government of this country had recognised the private ownership of these licences, and when he said licences he included the expectation of continuity in such licences. Certain supporters of the Bill would argue, he knew, that the brewers and those interested in them would not be ruined, or suffer so severely by the proposal of this section as some said, because they would be able to establish a sinking fund to pay off their mortgages, debentures, and one thing and another. He was not concerned whether the brewers could or could not keep their heads above water under this proposal. He was opposing it, not because they could or could not afford it, but because it was wrong, and he, therefore, would not attempt to enter into the question of whether these sinking funds could be raised or not. Did the monopoly, as the supporters of the Bill affirmed, in any way to-day belong to the State? He admitted that the State created it, but he contended that the State never held it and never looked upon it as State property. The State parted with the monopoly centuries ago, when they first created it, and he would like in this connection to quote a sentence from the book, "The History of the Liquor Licences of England," by Sidney and Beatrice Webb, whom, he thought, even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley would admit were not likely to put the case of "the trade" too strongly. They, speaking of the period as far back as 1552, said—

"What was of importance was the fact that Parliament, from the outset, implied that the number of licences was to be kept down to just enough for the supply of the legitimate wants of each neighbourhood, thus creating a sort of monopoly. Moreover, there was no idea of selling this monopoly to the highest bidder, and the justices were, in fact, required to issue their licence without charge."

That, he thought, showed that historically the monopoly value was parted with as soon as it was created by the State, and because the State now recognised that it had possibly made a bad bargain, and that it might be so much better off if it had retained that monopoly value in its own hands, the justice of its taking steps to resume possession of the monopoly value did not follow. What would the Courts of this or any other country say to the private individual who went to them and said: "I made a bad bargain, or my ancestors did centuries ago; give me back what they parted with." He thought the Courts would use the old maxim, vigilantibus non dormientibus lex subvenit, and dismiss the case with costs on the higher scale, and that the country when it had the opportunity would use some such expression and would decline to allow the State to resume possession of a monopoly which it had never used, and which it had parted with for a consideration, to perfectly honest individuals. Another argument that supporters of this clause were in the habit of using was that, because the licence was to come up for annual renewal, therefore it was purely a matter for one year; there could not be any legal expectation of renewal, and it was in the same legal position as an application for a new grant. Surely that was not so. The statutory procedure in the two cases was totally different, as anybody with the slightest experience knew. The difference in procedure was to his mind conclusive proof that every Government recognised now, and had always recognised, the difference between an application for renewal and an application for a new grant. There were many other analogous cases where it would be perfectly futile for any Government to argue that there was no expectation of a renewal, simply because the licence had to come up for renewal each year. How about theatrical licences? Would the Government argue that there was no right of expectation of a renewal of a licence in the case of a licence for a theatre? He thought that was an analogy more on a par with a liquor licence than anything else. The right hon. Member for the Spen Valley was delightful in his choice of analogies, and in his pamphlet he selected the analogy of agricultural tenancies.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley): Oh, no. The hon. Member will excuse me; I never selected such an analogy.

*MR. COURTHOPE said he read in the right hon. Gentleman's pamphlet—

"Property owners usually allow their tenants to continue tenancies from year to year without disturbance, but that does not in the slightest degree vitiate the right of the landlord to terminate one or all of the tenancies at the end of any year, and to impose entirely new terms, and let the houses to new tenants or to decline to let them to anyone."

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: If the hon. Member looks he will see that the kind of tenant to which I referred was the tenant of a house or shop.

*MR. COURTHOPE said that did not alter his argument. He certainly read them, and he thought most people would read the right hon. Gentleman's words as though they included agricultural land, and he believed they were intended to include agricultural tenancies.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: It strictly excludes them.

*MR. COURTHOPE reminded the right hon. Gentleman that it was not possible for the landlord to turn out his tenants or impose new terms, and if he attempted to do so, the State compelled the landlord to pay compensation for such disturbance, and the analogy broke down in every possible respect. Perhaps the most striking difference lay in the persons who paid the compensation. In the case of the liquor licences it was the unfortunate licencees themselves; in the case of landlord and tenant it was the landlord, who had disturbed the tenant. At all events, without pursuing this analogy further—[hear, hear]. He was not afraid to do so, but all he would say was that he really thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spen Valley must admit by now that he could not get much comfort for his support of this measure from his analogy of landlord and tenant, whether it was the landlord and tenant of a shop or an agricultural tenancy. Another point, and the last with which he would weary the Committee, as showing that the State had recognised the existence of private property in these licences, and their value was, of course, the well-known case of the death duties. He thought everybody in this House was familiar with the Inland Revenue Memorandum of 1890, and he knew perfectly well that when the opponents of the Bill made use of it the supporters of the measure said: "You are quite wrong; you ought not to make use of that; it was withdrawn in 1904." Was it withdrawn in 1904? As far as he could make out the only case they could make for the withdrawal of this Memorandum was that some Home Office Return or Memorandum was issued which, to a certain extent, seemed to have taken its place. But he did not mind whether the Memorandum was withdrawn or not; the practice was not withdrawn and the assessment of licensed premises for death duties was still made up to the present year, on the assumption that the licences would continue during the lifetime of the successor. He did not know whether it was a point of much importance or not, but this Memorandum of 1890 had been reprinted this year, and he obtained a copy from the Vote Office. But he carefully guarded himself from making a point of it, because he did not know whether it could be made, but the fact remained that the practice continued, and how the State or anyone else arguing about the rights given could possibly contend that it would be honest or just as between the State and the individual suddenly to take back the monopoly value upon which the individual owners had been taxed for so long passed his comprehension. There was no doubt that every Government had always recognised the existence of this property and this value. Did not the owners of this kind of property already contribute their full share of taxation to the nation? He found upon looking up the figures that beer alone contributed 5s. 10d. per head of the population.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: Who pays it?

*MR. COURTHOPE: I do not say it is paid entirely by the trade.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: No, the drinkers pay it.

*MR. COURTHOPE said that alcoholic liquor as a whole paid 15s. 11d. per head of the population, or 27 per cent. of the gross revenue of the State. Whoever might ultimately pay the tax, it came primarily from the liquor trade, and reduced the gross profits of the trade by some £40,000,000 a year. He thought that this class of property—every form of property connected with the sale of liquor—did its full share in providing the State with revenue. Arguments could not be found on that ground for placing an enormous additional burden on the trade. He would not enter into the question of period at all, because he regarded the principle of time-limit with concurrent compensation levy as bad altogether, and the evil only varied according to the length of the time-limit. He had not inquired as to the definition of “monopoly value” or whether there ought to be an Amendment of Section 4 of the Act of 1904, or of Section 20 of the Local Government Act of 1888, although he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister must have overlooked the fact that a very interesting principle arose in connection with the Local Government Act of 1888, because when the Finance Act of 1907 altered the procedure for the collection of licence duties for local taxation it apparently affected also the question of “monopoly value.” Nor had he attempted to inquire at all whether or not certain brewery companies, or how great a proportion of brewery companies, would be ruined if this section found its way into the Statute-book. The point he made was that this clause set up confiscation, by statute, of such a kind that it would strike a serious and fatal blow at public confidence and public security; and that robbery of this kind by the State from the individual within the State was not only discreditable, but that it would place a lasting stain on the national honour. It was because it was impossible, or ought to be impossible, to impose a time-limit upon common honesty between man and man, or State and individual, that he begged to move that this sub-clause be deleted from the Bill.

“In page 3, line 9, to leave out subsection (1).”—(Mr. Courthope.)

Question proposed, “That the words After the ’ stand part of the clause.”

Mr. LEVERTON HARRIS (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) asked whether the Prime Minister was now in a position to give a clear definition of the words “monopoly value.” This was the first clause of the Bill in which the term occurred, and the whole meaning of the clause depended upon the interpretation put upon those words. He might say “monopoly value” was one of the foundations upon which the whole fabric of the Bill was built. In view of that they were entitled to ask, and to know exactly what the meaning of “monopoly value” was, by what machinery it was to be fixed, and upon what basis “monopoly value” was to be paid. He thought the Prime Minister appreciated the difficulty in which the House was placed by having to debate this Bill without knowing what was meant by “monopoly value,” because on the Second Reading the right hon. Gentleman intimated that he would embody a definition. The right hon. Gentleman then said that whilst he could not give a precise pledge—

“It may be as well in view of what I have said, that before the Bill emerges from the Committee stage, and I am saying this almost without consultation with my colleagues, and only throwing it out as my own suggestion, to define in terms in the Bill what monopoly value really means.”

The necessity for this definition had become more and more apparent as the discussion on the Bill proceeded. Although, as the President of the Board of Trade had said, “All the ablest intellects in this country are concentrated on this Bill,” they had had a great variety of definitions of the meaning of “monopoly value.” The strange thing was that in spite of all the able intellects none of these definitions agreed with the others. It appeared that there was not a single Member who had given a definition who understood what the other definitions meant. The necessity for a clear definition had been fully recognised by other members of the Government besides the Prime Minister. The Home Secretary, for instance, on the Second Reading of the Bill, said—

“I for my part agree with the suggestion thrown out by the Prime Minister that the insertion of a definition in the Bill will make matters clearer than perhaps they are at present.”

The hon. and learned Member for Reading also found himself in a maze of doubt, because on the Second Reading he said—

“We are told, I think by the Prime Minister, that we shall have to define what it means. I hope he will. For myself I do not know whether I have quite apprehended what is intended by the Bill in stipulating for the payment of monopoly value."

After all these valuable opinions from right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite he did not think anybody would be bold enough to contend that immediate necessity did not exist for some clear definition, to assist them in discussing this clause, of what the Prime Minister and the Government meant by the term "monopoly value." He remembered a scientific experiment being performed by which several rays of brilliant light were concentrated on one spot on a screen. The result instead of being increased illumination was only darkness. The Committee were very much in the same position with regard to this Bill. The result of the concentration of all these brilliant minds on this Bill was that the Committee was left in a dense fog and a deeper obscurity than before. He had taken the trouble to go through several speeches made by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite on the question of monopoly value. He had read six speeches and had found ten definite and distinct definitions, five by the Prime Minister, two by the Home Secretary, one by the Solicitor-General, one by the hon. and learned Member for Reading, and one by the hon. Member for Spen Valley. The Prime Minister had made two speeches, one on the First Reading and one on the Second Reading, and in those two speeches had given five distinct definitions of monopoly value. If they took the first speech of the Prime Minister on the First Reading debate they would find that in that speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

"What the monopoly value really means is this, when it comes to be analysed. It means what people have been ready to pay, not for a right—there never was any right—but for an expectation, or to speak with strict accuracy for a double expectation. What do I mean by a double expectation? I mean, in the first place, the expectation that the licence once granted would, in the absence of misconduct, be periodically and indefinitely renewed, and, in the next place, an expectation that the justices would not allow effective competition with those to whom they had once granted it."

Those expectations were now destroyed, and were no longer to exist; that definition therefore could not hold with regard to the present Bill. He passed to the second declaration by the right hon. Gentleman—

"The problem to be solved is this. What is the additional rent which a person would pay for the house, with the privilege of the licence, as compared with the rent which he would pay for the house next door, carrying on in that house an unlicensed trade, and not enhanced, therefore, in value by a monopoly price?"

The right hon. Gentleman there put the definition in the form of a question the answer to which if it were given to him would not be satisfactory. He would put the question the other way. What would be the rent of a year's tenancy, at the end of which the tenant would be turned out, lock, stock, and barrel, into the street without any redress whatever? If monopoly value was to be defined on those terms the value which the Government would regain for themselves would be very small. He passed to the third definition of the right hon. Gentleman—

"The annual value of the licence is to be taken to be the sum by which the actual annual value of the licensed premises adopted for Schedule 'A.' of the income-tax exceeds the amount which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue determined would be that annual value if the premises were not licensed."

That seemed to be a practical, workable definition. It was the difference between two values not particularly difficult to ascertain. But when at last they thought they had got a definition upon which they could rely, in the very next speech which the right hon. Gentleman made, on the Second Reading of the Bill, he threw over the first three and gave a fourth definition. In the course of that speech he said—

"Measured in terms of rent it means, of course, what this publican tenant, in virtue of his receiving from the State a special privilege, which other classes of traders do not enjoy, would pay, as compared with that which would be given or offered by another tenant engaged in a business in which he was not similarly privileged. And, again, if you consider how the additional rent would be arrived at, it is pretty clear, I think, that it represents roughly, at any rate, the comparative extra profit——"

—the right hon. Gentleman there put it on a new basis altogether, the basis of rent—

"which the publican can make in virtue of his monopoly, as compared with the other tradesman, each being assumed to bring in, approximately, at any rate, the same amount of capital and to apply to his business the same skill and the same energy and the same enterprise."

In his fifth definition he said—

“If that is true—and I think it is, I do not think anybody will dispute it—the monopoly value, measured not as rent but as a lump sum, means the capitalised value of the difference between the licensed and the unlicensed rental of the premises. That is what is meant by monopoly value, I believe, in the Act of 1904—it is certainly what is meant by the Government in this Bill and in connection with this Bill, neither more nor less.”

To recapitulate these five definitions—they had monopoly value in terms of rent, first of all, additional rent as compared with a house which did not enjoy a licence. They had it, secondly, in the terms of an extra profit that the publican could make; they had it in the terms of an expectation that the licence would be indefinitely and periodically renewed, which was what the right hon. Gentleman told them it really meant. Definition four was the annual difference between Schedule A and the amount of the annual value if the premises were not licensed—that was to be the rule in the Bill; and then they got it lastly in the terms of capital or lump sum.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): Does the hon. Member say any one of these definitions is inconsistent with any other?

MR. LEVERTON HARRIS said if any hon. Member could find any consistency in these definitions such as could be accepted in a Court of law in defining the meaning of the Bill, he would be very much surprised. The last definition to which he had referred had the approval of the Home Secretary, who in the same debate, after reading the Prime Minister's definition, gave a definition of his own in order to make it clearer—a positively expert definition. He said—

“It can be defined by saying the monopoly value is the difference between licensed and unlicensed premises.”

If anybody could accept that as an accurate definition for the purpose of an Act of Parliament on a matter which was absolutely the most critical in the Bill, and upon which the existence almost of 66,000 licensed premises was going to depend, he was a more careless politician than he would like to be himself. Unlike the Home Secretary, the Solicitor-General refused to accept the Prime Minister's definition of capitalised value—in fact, he repudiated it altogether. He said—

“We make it impossible under the provisions of the Bill now before Parliament to have a lump sum at all. It is necessary for the licensing justices to fix the monopoly value year by year, and they cannot go any further.”

Then he gave an example of what would happen with regard to these houses—

“For the moment I will take the annual value instead of the lump sum. At £4,500 as the average monopoly value, at 4 per cent., you get £180 a year. That is sufficiently accurate for the purpose of my illustration.”

After listening to the First and Second Reading debates he could very well understand the maze of legal doubt in which the hon. and learned Member for Reading found himself when he made his speech with regard to this term of monopoly value. The Home Secretary, however, wanted to have a second shot in the prize competition, so he gave them another definition. This was Number 8—

“What would be the ordinary profit on the unlicensed trade? Say 6 per cent. What would be the profit on the licensed trade? That would have to be estimated in the first year, and ascertained from the books in succeeding years.”

Now they got a new method of arriving at it—

“Say it was 15 or 20 per cent. Take the difference between the two, allow something for good management and other considerations, as provided in Section IV. of the Act of 1904, and the result is the monopoly value—” —of course, that was perfectly simple—

“which may be either capitalised in a lump sum and paid, as in some cases, already, or it may be in the form of an annual payment.”

Now they had got the Home Secretary throwing in his lot with both the Prime Minister and the Solicitor-General, and he said they might take it whichever way they liked. Definition Number 9 was that given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Reading. He also did not want to be left out in the cold, and thought he would try his hand at an exposition of what was meant by monopoly value—

“I understand that to be something in the nature of rent, which he will have to pay for the privilege granted to him. In a case where a public-house is producing a profit of £1,000 a year the authorities will not take the whole or anything like the whole of that amount. They will say that having regard to the scale on which they assess the privilege of selling liquor in the district, such a house should pay say, £150 or £200 annually for this privilege."

In this definition he left it to the authorities to say, having regard to the scale of the district, what the house should pay. Now the last definition was that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Spen Valley, whose opinion they greatly valued. He said—

"Monopoly value is distinct from and in addition to an ordinary trade profit. Under the new conditions the brewer will make the ordinary manufacturer's wholesale profit on his beer, and he will make the ordinary reasonable retail profit on his business, and it is only what is beyond and additional to this that is the monopoly value."

He was almost tempted to catch the infection and define monopoly value himself. If he had to define it he should say the monopoly value as the Bill was at present was exactly what a person would pay for the monopoly, and neither more nor less. When they asked themselves what would a person pay for a year's monopoly, he thought the sum of money which any publican would be prepared to pay for the tenancy of a house on which he had very likely to spend a good deal of money in fixtures, and from which he might be evicted into the street at the end of twelve months without any notice, without any compensation, and without any redress whatever, would be very small. Could anything really be more absurd than the position in which the Committee found itself? They were legislating for 66,000 public-houses whose future existence depended entirely upon the monopoly value that was to be charged under the Bill, and yet nobody had any idea whatever of what monopoly value meant. He wanted to ask the Prime Minister if he could give them any enlightenment on this profoundly important question.

*MR. G. D. FABER (York) said the discussion must indeed be a momentous one, because on the first subsection of the clause depended the absolute fate of some 66,000 licensed properties, and right at the root, base, and foundation of the whole matter lay the question: To whom did the monopoly value in a licence belong? Could the supporters of the Bill make out to the satisfaction of the people of the country that the monopoly value belonged to the State? Before Edward VI. there was free trade in the sale of intoxicants. He thought the proposition of the hon. Member for the Appleby Division absolutely erroneous. He had said that licences were based on prohibition. He joined issue with that. If they searched the archives of the past they would find that the matter began in free trade. Why had the Government of a former day begun to put its hand upon that free trade? The truth was, first of all, that it was for the improvement of the morals of the people. It was found then, and much later under the Duke of Wellington's Act that it did not do to give free trade in the sale by retail of drinks. Therefore, the Government started the licensing system; first and foremost, in order to control the morals of the people, and, secondly, for revenue, which was just as vital then as it was to-day. How many hundreds of millions had the Government got out of the drink trade? They had control of the morals of the people by instituting the practice of licensing, and they had raised hundreds of millions of pounds of revenue. Surely, if that were so, and he ventured to say it was, then the State parted with the monopoly value of licences for what lawyers called "good and valuable consideration." In return for the regulation and control of morals and revenue, licences were granted, subject to good behaviour, and through that system began monopoly value. That was the origin of monopoly value; it arose out of restriction and revenue. The Prime Minister, in his First and Second Reading speeches, said that the State had got a very small share, an infinitesimal share, of the monopoly value. With the greatest possible respect for the right hon. Gentleman's high position he disagreed with that method of stating the case. The State had got a very large share of the profits derived from the monopoly value.

How had the subject been treated during all these decades? Had anybody until recently ventured to set up the argument that the monopoly value lay with the State? No Judge at any time or anywhere had ventured to set up the proposition that the monopoly value belonged to the State. If they searched the pages of Hansard they would not find that any great statesman until quite recently had ever said that monopoly value lay with the State. He would like, in this connection, to quote the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley, who was "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." The right hon. Member in this matter was the shadow behind the throne. He had the greatest possible respect for the right hon. Member's talents and for his genuineness on this question, but he and the right hon. Gentleman looked at the matter from opposite ends of the pole. He respected his views because he meant what he said. In the debate on the Licensing Bill of 1902, when the proposition was made to bring grocers' licences for the first time under the control of the licensing justices, the right hon. Member supported it with all his undoubted powers of argument and of knowledge. He said that—"In all licensing matters we have to choose between free trade and no value to the licence, and licence with a monopoly value. This is not a point which applies to grocers' licences only; it is a broad general principle. . . . These [grocer's] licences are a mere fraction of the total number of licences in the country, and whether or not this clause gives a monopoly value to them matters extremely little. We have given this monopoly value to the great bulk of licences, and to add a few thousand more will practically make no difference.

Later in the debate he said—

"They were told that it would give a monopoly value to these [grocers'] licences. That was inseparable from our policy of restriction. He admitted that the present system of licensing was not good, but these restrictions were better than none at all. Control involved monopoly. It was a choice of evils, but the position was clear. They must either have free trade or control, and if they had control they could not get rid of monopoly."

The importance of those quotations was this: How could the right hon. Gentleman now argue, in face of what he said in 1902, that the monopoly value lay with the State?

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: Will the hon. Gentleman excuse me a moment? The value is given to the licence and not to the licence-holder.

*MR. G. D. FABER said he could not accept that explanation. Did the right hon. Gentleman really contend that his words meant that the value was merely given to the licence and not to the licensee?

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: Yes, it says so.

*MR. G. D. FABER: Why, the two were one and the same. There could not be a licence without a licence-holder. He was once a lawyer, now many years ago, though he had forgotten the little law he ever knew, but he tried not to split hairs. He believed that nine out of ten members of the Committee, if they referred to the quotation for themselves in Hansard, must come to the conclusion that what the right hon. Gentleman meant when he said that this monopoly value had been given to the great bulk of licences was that the State had given it in order to get restriction in return. Therefore, he could not be heard to argue now that the State was entitled to take that value back into its own hands whenever it pleased without paying one farthing. That was his first proposition, that wherever monopoly value lay, it did not lie with the State. His second proposition, in support of which he invoked the aid of the Law Courts and the whole practice of the Executive of this country, was that the value lay with the holder of the licence. It was strange that the course of politics should cause him that day to quote the late Mr. Gladstone in defence of the rights of property. In 1880, Mr. Gladstone—and he put this in the forefront of his argument—said—

"We ought not to allow our prejudices with regard to this particular trade, or our sense of the enormous mischiefs associated with its working, to cause us to deviate by one hair's breadth from the principle on which Parliament has always acted in analogous cases—namely, that where a vested interest has been allowed to grow up the question of compensation should be considered when such vested interests were proposed to be interfered with by Act of Parliament. What I am prepared to say is neither more nor less than this—that the licensed victualler has the same right to fair consideration that is enjoyed by persons following every other trade or calling which is interfered with by Act of Parliament, and to whom compensation is awarded owing to such interference."

That was rather different language from that used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 25th May at Edinburgh.

What a difference there was between the two right hon. Gentlemen in stating the same proposition. Mr. Gladstone spoke again on the same subject in 1890, but for the purposes of his present argument he could quote Mr. Gladstone's speech of 1890 with just as much point as his speech of 1880. In 1890, having the then recently decided case of Sharpe v. Wakefield in his mind, Mr. Gladstone said that every owner of licensed property must be taken to be aware of the law. He said—

“ I think it is one thing to say the publican has not, and cannot by any possibility have, any claim whatever under the provisions of the law as it now exists in regard to the non-renewal of licences that does not at once carry with it the consequence that if you fundamentally change the character of the law you bring in a state of things which the publican has no means of anticipating.”

That was why he quoted the speech of 1890 in aid of his argument.

MR. ASQUITH said that in the passage preceding the words quoted by the hon. Member, Mr. Gladstone said that in regard to the question of compensation if a general measure were introduced some arrangement of time might be made to soften the transition. Mr. Gladstone further stated—

“ I am bound to say that I reserve my own discretion upon that subject.”

[MINISTERIAL laughter.]

*MR. G. D. FABER said he deprecated that laughter. The Government were introducing a change in the law which the publican had no means of anticipating, and by which his position was vitally altered, which was the point laid stress upon by Mr. Gladstone, and he was entitled to full compensation.

When a publican's compensation case came before the Law Courts, was it ever contended that full compensation should not be given, when the property was taken away for some public improvement, because the monopoly value of the licence belonged to the State? Such a ludicrous argument would never be brought forward by anybody. When it came to a question of rating property, did anybody say: “ Oh, no! The publican must not be rated as high as this; the monopoly value belongs to the State, and the publican has got to hand it over sometime. Did any rating authority ever try to do anything of the kind? No, because the monopoly value for rating purposes was always included. When they came to the Inland Revenue procedure it was clear and there was no getting out of it, because it was all against the assumption that the monopoly value belonged to the State. The very instructive Instruction issued in 1890 by the Inland Revenue treated licences as a continuing property for the purposes of the death duties and valued them up to the hilt. Then came the Finance Act of 1894, introduced by Sir William Harcourt, which laid down that in valuing property they must take the market value. That did not alter the position. What the Revenue authorities did after 1894 was to value licensed property according to its value in the open market. And now, at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute, they were told that a new set of Instructions in 1900 had altered the position. He denied that altogether. The Revenue authorities were still valuing licensed property according to its value in the open market. They valued it as a going concern. He prayed in aid of his argument the whole course of practice of the Inland Revenue. He would also like to pray in aid a further argument, namely, the action of the Secretary of State for War. What did he do in the matter of the “ Coach and Horses”? The “ Coach and Horses” was the property of the War Office, and had a reserve price put upon it with the cognisance of the right hon. Gentleman. A Minister of the Crown was supposed to know everything that went on in his Department, and the right hon. Gentleman would know that the “ Coach and Horses” had a reserve price of £10,000 put upon it. Sir William Dupree had the property knocked down to him at public auction for £10,000. What he wanted to know was this. Did the right hon. Gentleman sell the monopoly value or did he not? That value had been computed by a competent man at £7,500 out of the total sum of £10,000 paid. If he did not sell the monopoly value, why was the reserve fixed at £10,000, seeing that the house and land, without the monopoly value, were only worth £2,500? If he did sell the monopoly value, he was sure

he must have been infinitely sorry for the unfortunate purchaser. From his appreciation of the right hon. Gentleman's character he was sure that his bowels must yearn over this poor unfortunate gentleman who had paid £10,000 for a property which, owing to the Bill now brought forward would only be worth £2,500—

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): As the hon. Member has succeeded in bringing me to my feet, I can assure him that the purchaser has publicly stated that he is well satisfied with his purchase.

*MR. G. D. FABER: Ah! but no. He was only reading, yesterday, what Sir William Dupree had said. He said he was perfectly satisfied with his bargain if the Government would leave him alone. He would say with all good-humour that he did not think the right hon. Gentleman ought to have interrupted him without quoting the whole phrase. It was not often that a humble person like himself could get the Secretary of State for War on the horns of a dilemma, and he was not going to let him off. If the right hon. Gentleman knew, as he did know, that the Government were introducing a Bill smashing the monopoly value—transferring it from the individual to the State—was it quite fair to sell that property without saying a word about it? Probably, though, the right hon. Gentleman knew that this Bill had not a shadow of a shade, not a scintilla of a chance of ever becoming law, and that, therefore, Sir William Dupree would come out all right in the end. He, therefore, maintained that he had established a very strong presumption that the monopoly value did not belong to the State, but did belong to the individual. Was it fair or reasonable to put the State into this extraordinary position? Putting the argument at the highest for the State, it was a matter of grave doubt whether the State had any right to the monopoly value at all. Was it right to put the State in that position?—

“ You do it wrong, being so majestic,
To offer it the show of violence.”

The Government represented the State and they were turning the State into a common robber. He deliberately used those strong words, knowing as a business man and as a banker, what a prejudicial effect this precedent would have on the security of property in this country. They were allowing the State for the first time in the history of the country to take away the property of the individual and appropriate it without paying a farthing of compensation. Let them not say that they were giving compensation. They were giving none at all. The compensation provided was not found by the State. It was being provided by the wretched individuals whom, at the end of fourteen years they were proposing not only to hang but to draw and quarter. They were going to appropriate without payment, the 60,000 licences odd, remaining at the end of the reduction period and they were not content with that, for under the new proposals put on the Amendment Paper at the last moment, local option was to have an opportunity to fix its tyrannous grasp on all licences left after the reduction period and sweep them out of creation altogether. [Laughter.] He did not think hon. Gentlemen opposite would laugh if they held licensed property. It was the late Sir William Harcourt or some equally wise man who said that one of the faults of the Radical Party was that they were apt to be conscious not so much of their own demerits as of those of other people.

He hoped this subsection would not be allowed to pass into law, for it would produce chaos during the next fourteen years, and a colossal wrong at the end of that period. During those fourteen years they were going to upset the whole licensed trade of the country. They were going to create pandemonium, because human nature would assert itself and everybody would be trying “to get out.” Of course, they would get a worse type of man in the public-houses; and human nature being what it was they would get a worse class of house. And why? Because everybody would be trying to get a little bit out of the general scramble. The Prime Minister would agree with him that it would be a very serious matter.

The holders of stock in brewery companies were of different classes—holders of debentures, holders of preference shares, and ordinary shareholders. Why, the passing of this Bill into law would necessarily drive all these different classes of shareholders at each others' throats. The ordinary shareholders who control the business, subject to the payment of the fixed rate of interest on debentures and preference shares, would say: "We will not have any sinking fund, because if we do, it will never reach us at the end of the fourteen years; it will be all swallowed up by those in front of us." If he were an ordinary shareholder, and in control of the business, he knew that he would not establish a sinking fund. He would get all the dividends he could during the fourteen years, because otherwise, at the end of the fourteen years he would be left. But would the debenture holder take this "lying down"? No; he would go to the Court and ask for a receiver. Then mark the extraordinary position that would ensue. The receiver might, or might not, conceive it to be his duty to set aside a sinking fund. All the different classes of shareholders would be torn by rival considerations. If the ordinary shareholders had a free run, would they establish a sinking fund for the benefit of the debenture or preference shareholders? There was nothing in the Bill to say that they should do so. He brought forward those considerations to show that they were only at the very beginning of the difficulty. All sorts of complications and injustices which could not have been foreseen by the framers of the Bill would inevitably arise.

He had tried to examine this matter on the merits of the case and on these only. He hoped he had shown to the satisfaction of hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House, if not of those on the Government side, that by every rule of practice and right the value of the licence lay with the licence holder, and with nobody else.

MR. ASQUITH: The question which is raised by this Amendment is undoubtedly one of vital importance, and while I do not in the least complain of the length of the exhaustive speech to which we have just listened, I hope I may be able, in a comparatively short space of time, to put before the Committee that with which indeed they are already familiar, the position of the Government and the supporters of the Bill in regard to this matter. The issue raised by the Amendment is simply this: Whether the principle of a time-limit is sound, politic and just. The question of the length of the time-limit does not arise at this stage. It will be the subject of discussion on later Amendments. The issue raised by the hon. Member for Rye who moved the Amendment and which he quite fairly endeavoured to present, was that no time-limit, however long—it is not a question of duration at all—that no time-limit could be honourably or equitably introduced in legislation of this kind or indeed without violating the principles on which the security of property in this country depends. Very well, that was an easy thesis and upon that issue the division I apprehend will be taken. A good deal has been said in the course of the discussion, and very properly and relevantly said, as to the meaning that ought to be attached to the phrase "monopoly value." Because the essence of the time-limit is that on the expiration of a certain number of years, which I will call x years for the moment, it is the contention of the framers and promoters of the Bill that it is within the right of the State and that it is politic and expedient for the State to resume the monopoly value which the State itself has created in this particular form.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): Without paying for it?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, certainly, without paying for it out of the public funds. That is not a very relevant remark, but as the right hon. Gentleman makes it, I may remind him that I am strictly following the precedent of the Act of 1904, with regard to the source from which the payment is drawn. But that is not my point, I am dealing with the question of time—whether it is fair to say that after the expiration of a certain time it is within the right and is politic and expedient for the State to resume complete property in this monopoly value. What is meant by monopoly value? The phrase is not of our invention. It is taken from the Act of 1904, and I must assume that to the framers of that Act it had some definite intention and intelligible meaning. I quote from the Act, Section 4, subsection 2—

“Such conditions shall, in any case, be attached as having regard to the proper provision for suitable premises and good management, the Justices think best adapted for securing to the public any monopoly value which is represented by the difference between the value which the premises will bear, in the opinion of the Justices, when licensed, and the value of the same premises if they were not licensed.”

Now, what better definition can you possibly have? Our definition is taken from the Act of 1904, and bears the same meaning with regard to those existing licences with which we are going to deal at the expiration of the time-limit as was in the minds of the framers of the Act with regard to new licences. An hon. Member who preceded me was good enough in the course of his interesting speech—and it must have cost him a good deal of unwelcome labour and perseverance to unearth them—to quote from two if not three speeches of mine no less than five definitions of monopoly value. I am very much indebted to the hon. Gentleman for the pains he has taken. I should not have thought it possible to have expressed five entirely different formulæ conveying exactly one and the same idea. I am most grateful to the service he has been good enough to give to my powers. What are all these definitions? A speaker is sometimes inconsistent with himself and sometimes with the utterances of his own colleagues; but the odd thing is that when the hon. Gentleman, pursuing his researches in this sphere of ministerial dicta, quoted from my right hon. friend the Home Secretary and my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-General, and added two more links to his catena, they were all identical one with another. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh; but I ventured to interrupt the hon. Gentleman—with courtesy I hope—with what I think was a very relevant question. When he had come to an end of his citations, I said to him: “Will you kindly point out which of these definitions is inconsistent one with another?” and he did not attempt the task, because the more he looked into them the more he found that they were perfectly consistent. There is no mystery about this matter at all. As the framers of the Act of 1904 very well knew, the monopoly value, to use their own phrase, of licensed houses, is the addition to the value they would fetch if they were used for other purposes than the carrying on of the monopolised trade. And that addition must be, in the long run, regulated by the additional profit which the person who tenders himself as the tenant of these premises expects to receive from the user of them in the exercise of the monopolised trade compared to that which he would get as the user in any other trade. It is the very simplest thing in the whole world. The hon. Gentleman thought I was guilty of inconsistency because I had suggested at different times and in different speeches different ways in which that monopoly value could be measured. It can be measured by additional rent; by assessment—the difference for which the premises would be assessed under Schedule A of the Income-Tax according to the purposes for which they were to be used; or by the capitalisation of the difference between the two rents or values as the case may be. Where is the inconsistency or the difficulty of defining the subject matter? It cannot be denied by anyone, and certainly not by any of the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen responsible for the Act of 1904, that that additional value does exist, and that it has been brought into existence by the State by granting the licence to the licence-holder, and that it can be properly described as monopoly value. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, with strange confusion of thought says that monopoly value does not belong to the State because you have given it to somebody else. But that is the foundation of the whole matter. I will comment for a moment on the word “given.” It is quite true, as my right hon. friend the Member for the Spen Valley has said in his pamphlet, that the State has given to the licence, by the fact that it confers a monopoly, a value of its own, and undoubtedly, as the law now is, persons have been in the habit of considering that having once, for one year, been permitted by the State to enjoy that monopoly value, they are to be allowed to continue to enjoy it for an indefinite period. If it had not been for the expectation created by practice, there would have been no occasion for a time-limit at all. Why have we put a time-limit into the Bill? Simply to meet, not a strict legal or statutory claim—nothing of the kind. In the United States and in our own Colonies they have taken away licences over and over again without notice. We have inserted a time-limit simply because an expectation has grown up round the licence, and we thought it would be, not only ungenerous, but inequitable at once to bring to an end and to resume for the State a monopoly value of that kind. Is it denied that a time-limit is the proper way of dealing with this matter? That is the issue raised by this Amendment, and that is a point which I wish to bring keenly and clearly to the attention of the Committee, because it is the issue on which this matter turns. If what I have said is correct, the issue is this—it is an issue between treating the precarious privilege granted by an annual licence to the licence-holder, surrounded, as it has been in the past, with this atmosphere of expectation—between treating that as a thing which on due notice is terminable and rightly resumable by the State, or treating it as if it were a right of property in the full sense of being established under the law. Are you going to say they are the same thing? [An Hon. MEMBER: Yes.] Are you? I hear a rather feeble “Yes.” That is the issue raised by this Amendment. [Cries of “No.”] We are not dealing here with the question of time or the length of time; but we are dealing with the question whether there should be any time-limit which reason or justice may prescribe as suited to the necessities of the case, and without the payment of one penny of compensation out of public money. Is that denied? It is denied by those who support the Amendment and by the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London, who has the courage of his convictions, and takes upon himself to say so. Yes; but is that the view of the whole of the responsible Opposition? If they vote for this Amendment I assume it is; but if they do, there must have been some singular revolution going on in the minds of some of them. I am not going back into ancient history, not even so far back as the Act of 1904; but I will read a short passage from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition on the night this Bill was introduced. On that occasion he said—

“I have never supposed for a moment, nor did the other authors of the Act of 1904 suppose, that owners of licensed property had a freehold in that particular property; and I can quite conceive that after a term of years during which there was no disturbance you might say, ‘You have had time to insure, you have had a security of tenure which is less than freehold, and we give you ample time in which to make the necessary provision for the moment at which the State will resume the licence.’”

Is that still the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman? It is not the doctrine of his colleague in the representation of the City of London, or of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment. No, it is not, because the issue is not the duration of the time-limit, but whether the State, after giving a reasonable notice, equitable in all the circumstances and conditions of the case, can or cannot resume its property. We say it can, and my sole object in rising is to put that issue clearly. We say it can, and we evoke in support of that proposal the authority of no less a person than the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. When we come to the later part of the discussion on this clause we shall be prepared to listen to what may be said with regard to our particular proposals as to the length of time. But that is not the issue now before us, and I ask the Committee by an overwhelming majority to decide that the State can and will resume possession of a monopoly which belongs to it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): I do not complain of the right hon. Gentleman having quoted a passage from a speech of mine on an earlier stage of this Bill, for I adhere to every word of the passage he quoted. I have, indeed, uttered precisely the same doctrine on public platforms outside the House. I have said it elsewhere as I have said it here, and I believe that what I have said and what the right hon. Gentleman has quoted is absolutely true. Therefore, I do not complain of the right hon. Gentleman quoting those words, but of his having utterly, though unintentionally no doubt, mis-stated to the House what is the issue on which we are going to vote. He says the issue is whether, in certain circumstances, which are not the circumstances which he has stated, you may conceive a sort of time-limit which will not interfere with the just rights of the licence-holders. That is an abstract proposition and I do not feel disposed to quarrel with it. What I quarrel with is not the proposals the Government might have made, but the proposals which they have made. What I complain of is that the Government having taken as the basis of their legislation the Act of 1904, have grafted on it wholly and utterly inconsistent principles making up a confusion the result of which is fundamentally and essentially inequitable, and that quite irrespective of the length of time, whether it be fourteen years or  $x$ , or whatever the time was, quite irrespective of the time-limit it is proposed to introduce into the Bill. Let me remind the House of the historical growth of this difficulty. The practice in the last century was undoubtedly that every licence-holder had a secure anticipation—I do not say a legal right—that, in the absence of misconduct, his licence would not be interfered with. On that anticipation money was borrowed, contracts were made, and very large and important businesses were erected. Certain magistrates, exercising what appeared to be a legal right, did, in certain cases, interfere with licence-holders and evict them from their premises, ruining them in the process, without any notice and without any compensation. Those magistrates were acting within their legal rights. I believe it was tried to upset them, but their action was upheld. I do not quarrel over that. What I say is that by that action the magistrates introduced a condition of things into a perfectly legitimate trade which you would tolerate in no other trade in the world. For evils far less than that you have passed legislation through the House of Commons—both Parties have been responsible for it—which was intended to prevent that particular kind of insecurity. It is not merely bad for the individual who suffers from it, but it is bad for the whole management of the trade. We were face to face with that position. The number of licences actually reduced or that had any probability of being reduced, was extremely small under the old system. Why? Because it would be little less than iniquitous to reduce to beggary a perfectly innocent and well-behaved man carrying on a legitimate trade. Therefore, the existing system, as we found it, was not good for the reduction of licences, and it was not good for the cause of temperance. The magistrates were practically hampered in their desire to suppress unnecessary licences. They could not do that without gross and iniquitous injustice. We attempted to deal with that, and we attempted to deal with it in a manner which was not, I think, ungenerous to the trade, which was accepted by the trade, and which, by the consent of all mankind, has produced a very large reduction of licences, and that without any feeling of bitterness, injustice, or hardship in those immediately concerned. When we were passing that Bill which has been more grossly misrepresented by hon. Gentlemen opposite even than my considerable experience of their powers in that direction could have led me to believe, we were constantly told that we were endowing the licence-holders with a freehold. I have constantly at the time the Bill was before the House and since denied that, and I deny it now. I did not think then that we were endowing the licence-holders with a freehold right, and I do not think the Act of 1904 gave them a freehold right. I do not think at this moment that they possess a freehold right, and if anyone will refer to my statements on the Act of 1904, they will see that that was my view then. Anybody who listened to the quotation which the right hon. Gentleman read a few minutes ago will see that that was my opinion on the First Reading of this Bill. It was my opinion then, it has been the same in the interval, and it remains my opinion now. We have to deal with a genuine form of property which is less than a full freehold tenure. I am not here concerned to deny that if you are dealing with a form of property which is less than a freehold tenure you may imagine a term years after which you may say to these people: "Your rights, which are less than freehold, are now exhausted." I have never denied that, and I do not deny it now. What I deny is that you have the smallest right to compel these people to pay compensation during a period of years to those whose licences are withdrawn, and then at the end of the term of years, after they have been paying this compensation steadily and patiently, allow their property to be taken away. The right hon. Gentleman has wholly mis-stated the issue before us. The issue before us is not whether we are dealing with a trade that has a freehold right to the licence. We are not arguing that point. I do not maintain it, my friends on this bench have never maintained it, and I do not believe anybody behind has maintained it. Do not let anybody go into the lobby thinking that is the issue which we have to decide. We have to decide a much more difficult and important issue, one which touches the rights of a very large class and, I think, a not undeserving class of the community. I beg every Member of the House who supports this Bill to ask himself whether, if you were dealing with Irish tenants or with English tenants of agricultural land, you would venture to argue as you are arguing about this Bill. You advance doctrines absolutely unsustainable in themselves, because the class against which you direct your legislation is an unpopular class. The long controversy about temperance has got so entangled and mixed up with the attacks upon licence-holders that there are vast bodies of men in this country who honestly but surely most foolishly and mistakenly believe they are serving the cause of morality by committing an injustice against a particular class. Those who are going to vote for retaining this subsection are, I am absolutely certain, whether they know it or not, making themselves parties to this iniquitous transaction. I ask anybody how he is going to justify this condition of things. A particular locality requires, and is admitted by all but extreme temperance reformers or fanatics—whichever word you like to use—to require, the services of a public-house. The magistrates give a licence to that public-house, and require the licensee to make very costly changes and alterations in the building in order to fit it for a public object, which the licensing magistrates themselves admit is a public object which ought to be met. Having done that you tell this man, after he has made improvements and spent money—perhaps he has built a house specially suited for this purpose and not specially suited for any other—that henceforth he is to pay to a compensation fund in order that other people's licences may not be taken away without compensation. He admits he has not a freehold ownership of his licence, and contributes to that fund. When he has done that, and acquired all the rights of equity which that process involves, you go to him and say, "You have done an important public service and you will see your neighbour receiving compensation for the licence which will probably be withdrawn from him. Having carried out that public object we have to inform you that at the end of the fourteen years you will be turned into the street. You will be regarded as having no further title to carry on your business, on which you have spent a great deal of capital, on which you have borrowed money, on which you have entered into great obligations, and we consider this quite reasonable and equitable, because, after all, you must remember your tenure is something less than freehold." That I call a derisory statement. If the Government are so incapable of seeing what are the true equities of this situation, if they can make no distinction between the full title I have described for convenience as a freehold title, and that somewhat less but equally sacred title which by the commercial practice and by the practice of the Inland Revenue, and by the practice of the Government themselves when they are selling, regulates the trade, if they cannot see that that kind of property, though less than freehold property, is not less sacred and not less deserving of being carefully safeguarded, they are not fit to govern a great industrial community. I conceive that either the Prime Minister will speak again before this division is taken or that some of his colleagues will take part in the debate. I beg that colleague not to fall into the error which has beset the Prime Minister in his speech. D

not let him deal with an issue on which, I believe, there is no difference of opinion on either side of the House, but with the issue on which there is a difference of opinion. The issue is this. We say it is grossly inequitable, whether the term be fourteen years or any longer period, to require people to pay compensation for the abolition of public-houses, and then at the end to turn them out of their property, to render nugatory valueless improvements which they have made at the demand of the magistrates, and require them to lose not merely the additional property which is given them by the licence, but the property which is involved in the goodwill. Goodwill is a very important factor in the case. A man holding a licence and conducting a public-house may have a property not merely in the licence of the public-house, but in the goodwill which his good management or good fortune has enabled him to obtain. You have no more right to sacrifice the goodwill of a publican than you have to sacrifice the goodwill of a butcher or other tradesman. These are the real issues before the Committee in dealing with this subsection. It is not the abstract question whether licence-holders have or have not a full tenure. The real question is whether the scheme of the Government is by its nature and essence grossly unjust to a deserving body of the community—a body who have as much right to the protection of this House as any other class connected with either the retail or the wholesale trade of the country—its manufactures or its agriculture. For these reasons I shall most heartily support my hon. friend when he goes to a division. This is the crucial point of the Bill. The point has not, indeed, been put by the Prime Minister, but it has been put by my hon. friend. I believe that whether you turn fourteen years into twenty or however you may translate the  $\pi$  of the Prime Minister's speech into numbers, so long as the framework of your Bill remains unchanged so long will that Bill embody a real, substantial, and, I may even say, a gross injustice to those who have a right to fair treatment, honest treatment, the treatment which, whether the persons concerned be popular or unpopular, the Legislature is bound to extend to every single one of His Majesty's subjects.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER said that the point which the Leader of the Opposition had made was one which was very familiar to those who were present during the discussion of the Act of 1904. The right hon. Gentleman's great objection was that during the time-limit the licence-holder, the property-holder, would have to contribute to a compensation fund for others. The real fundamental issue was, he (Sir Thomas Whittaker) thought, the amount of security which the licence-holder had in his licence. The phrase the right hon. Gentleman used was that he had a secure anticipation—therefore it was an anticipation or expectation, not a definite right, and an expectation might involve, and usually did involve, doubt and risk. It had always been his (the speaker's) contention that the trade knew the law and the risk—and he contended that they knew the risk was great. The prospectus of the Licence Insurance Corporation, asking for subscriptions, was not issued in 1904, but in 1891, before the benches to whom they had been told the Act of 1904 was due, commenced to take any action. This was a corporation providing a guarantee fund against the loss of licences. They did not establish a Licence Insurance Corporation unless there was a considerable risk. This corporation was not formed by an outside body of financial speculators to exploit the trade, but by the trade themselves. The document contained a list of the directors and founders of the corporation, and they included the representatives of some of the leading breweries—Ind, Coope & Co., Hall & Sons, of Oxford, and others. There was circulated with the prospectus a list of 350 breweries "supporting and welcoming insurance against this risk." People did not insure a freehold. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Against fire."] They did not insure the freehold against being taken over. [OPPOSITION cries of "Not yet," and "You will have to in future."] He wished to read what they said in this prospectus. This was the statement of the leading brewers of the country as to the position of the trade and as to the position of the licences. The corporation was formed, as he had said, to provide a guarantee against the loss of licences. How was it welcomed? The prospectus said—

“A very large number of letters have been received showing that insurance against loss of licence is warmly welcomed by the trade.”

This did not indicate great security. Another paragraph said—

“Experience shows that prior to 1891 wherever additional security was procurable it was eagerly sought.”

These words would indicate that they were insuring something in the nature of an overdue vessel, or something of that sort. Then it said—

“A licence-holder obtaining a policy will be relieved of the uncertainty which has hitherto been so harassing where large capital has been embarked and is in jeopardy.”

That showed that the trade, or the 350 brewers, recognised that they were in the presence of serious risk, and that they had a precarious security. [Cries of “No.”] If there was not a serious risk, why did they say it was “so harassing”?

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): They were insuring against the risk of losing a licence through a breach of the law by their managers.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: Oh, no. It is a policy insuring the holder of the licence compensation in case of renewal being refused on the ground of “not required.”

MR. YOUNGER: Will the right hon. Gentleman read it through?

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: They insured against all risks, but that was one of them that was put forward. He would take the first paragraph of the prospectus—

“In consequence of the judgment of the House of Lords in Sharp v. Wakefield, and of the risks now incurred of non-renewal of licence, this corporation has been formed to insure and guarantee compensation to licence-holders for loss incurred in the event of non-renewal.”

It was that which harassed them, and it was that against which they wanted protection. It was after that they saw

Sir Thomas Whittaker.

230 breweries registered as companies, and it was during three years prior to that, while the case was still going on, that eighty-six more were registered. Then the public came in; they knew the risk, and the statement which he had quoted proved that they knew it. Now when the public were asked to come in, and when they put the prospectuses of their breweries before the country, were they equally frank? Did they tell the country that they were harassed? But they said something more in this document—

“Experience shows that wherever additional security is procurable, it is eagerly sought, and commands remunerative rates. It is, therefore, unquestionably only a matter of time for licensed property to become almost un-negotiable, unless additional security offered by such assurance is added.”

They knew the risk, and it was a great risk; they knew that these licences were precarious. The Leader of the Opposition had made a great point of the injustice, as he alleged, of levying compensation, and then, at the end of the time, that the licence-holder should get no benefit from it. There were many methods of insurance. They might insure against a temporary risk, or a contingent risk; and what was provided here was that during fourteen years the licence-holder should be secured in his holding of the licence, or should be compensated for such portion of the term as he lost. But he was not to have both the run and the compensation. He insured against the risk during that time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, who was Solicitor-General in the late Government, had properly described this as compulsory mutual insurance. If everybody had taken advantage of this Licence Insurance Corporation there would have been no necessity for the Bill of 1904; but they did not, and very probably could not avail themselves of the scheme. This prospectus showed, with the approval of 350 brewers, that it was the right and duty of the trade itself to provide its own insurance, and the Act of 1904 simply made that right and duty compulsory, and they were compelled to insure. They were to have their fourteen years run, or compensation for such portion of it as they lost; they could not have both, and there was no iniquity about that. Let them go back to the basis of the whole thing. The hon. Member for York had gone into the history of the matter, and had referred to the Act of 1552, the object of which was, he said, to secure control. He agreed. But how was it done? By the power to control and to suppress or take away the right to sell; to prevent anybody and everybody from selling. That was the right given to the justices, the right "to do away with" houses, that being the expression used. That was the origin of our licensing system, the power of suppressing—the power to take away the right to sell. The moment they did that they began to create a value. If that power were exercised freely, they gave a value to the licence, and the more it was exercised the greater the value to those who obtained the privilege. By that means they interfered with the original object of the licence; that was, they interfered with their power of control. Their difficulty had arisen from the fact that these licences had become valuable in the market; they were valuable in the market because it was difficult to get them, and because, in the interests of the public, only a few were granted. Therefore, the exercise of this power interfered with the exercise of the very control which the hon. Member correctly stated was the object of the establishment of our licensing system. The object of this Bill was to restore to the nation the efficient control which it had lost through that process. The hon. Member had referred to the raising of revenue. It was a long while subsequent to the commencement of the licensing system that revenue was derived from licences, and there was not a great deal now. The revenue was from liquor and not from licences. But the hon. Member had developed a very ingenious theory out of this, namely, that it was a bargain; that if they paid, they were to have something in return. Where was the bargain recorded? Where was the document, where the deed, where the Act? It did not exist. There was no bargain.

*MR. G. D. FABER: It was an equitable one.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: There was no equitable bargain about it. The licence was granted for twelve months and no longer. That was the bargain. The hon. Member said they had given a monopoly value to the licence. Yes, by their very policy of restricting the number of houses, which gave a value to the licences; but they did not give that value in the sense of its being the permanent possession of the licence-holder. It was true that it was a valuable privilege, and they granted it for one year; they did not part with their permanent possession of it, any more than the landlord of a dwelling house when he let it to a tenant for a period parted with his permanent ownership of the property. They had created the value by restricting the number of licences, but by so doing they had not parted with their right of control; it was that point of control that they wanted to recover now, and they could only recover it by getting rid of that monopoly value which had grown up, and those who had it ought to be very thankful they had held it so long. In reference to the argument that the Inland Revenue for purposes of valuation took the market value, it had been pointed out again and again that the Department did not go into the method by which market value was arrived at. It did not justify it, it did not defend it.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University): The Inland Revenue lay down that they are to take into consideration in valuing that the licence will last in the case of a leasehold through the whole length of the lease or for ever in the case of a freehold.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: Oh no; the last Memorandum issued in the time of the right hon. Gentleman's own Government laid down nothing of the kind. It was ascertained whether the property was leasehold or freehold, and then the market value of the licence was obtained. The Inland Revenue never justified a market value; they were never heard to say that it was too high or too low. If brewers and publicans in their reckless struggle for licences had inflated values it was their responsibility, and theirs alone. Illustrations were numerous of other kinds of property which were inflated to an artificial value. If the holders died the death duty would have to be paid on that value, but that did not mean that the Inland Revenue justified or defended or guaranteed it. The mover of the Amendment said the licences had been bought and sold and the State had no right to touch them. What did the licence holders buy and sell? They bought and sold a licensed property with a locus standi for renewal, or an expectation of renewal and nothing more. There was nothing more to sell. A man could not sell what he did not own. He did not own the licence for any time after the year. If they had given absurd prices it was their own fault. It was said that the State parted with the monopoly value centuries ago, but it never parted with anything of the kind. It gave the licence for a twelve month and no longer. When did the State make the bargain? Where was the record of it? The mover of the Amendment claimed a freehold, and laid stress on this point, that the procedure with regard to renewals was different from that with regard to new licences. But it was purely procedure. The power of the justices was perfectly clear. The procedure was different in the ordinary tenancy of an ordinary house with regard to a new tenant, from what it was with regard to a tenant in possession who had to have so much notice. But that did not invalidate the landlord's right to give a tenant notice and get rid of him and take possession of the property. On this point of procedure, as between renewal and a new licence, Lord Justice Fry said—

“Nothing to my mind is more plain than that the exercise of the discretion is one and the same, with regard to the persons who keep and the persons who are about to keep, public houses. No distinction is drawn between the two classes, but their existence as separate classes, if you like, so to say, is recognised. The jurisdiction and the power are alike in both cases, and the discretion is alike in both cases.”

On this Lord Halsbury, in the House of Lords in 1891, said—

“Now the Acts of 1872 and 1874, which are Acts upon which reliance is placed, do not profess to limit the discretion, but enact certain new procedure, all of which procedure is perfectly consistent with the preservation intact of the discretion given to the justices.”

The discretion was absolutely the same, and therefore the point that there was a difference in procedure made no difference whatever as to the discretion of the justices. The hon. Member had referred to agricultural tenancies. If he would only turn to his (Sir Thomas Whittaker's) book which he had quoted he would see that he had referred there to the tenancy of ordinary houses and shops, and it was because he knew there was no right of compensating for disturbance there that he went to a special kind of tenancy where the Legislature had enacted that there should be compensation. Until the Act of 1904 there was no right of compensation for licences. If there had been, why should they have passed the Act of 1904? That Act had to be passed to meet a special case, and his analogy held perfectly good. The real issue was as stated by the hon. Member for York—how were they to recover their control?

*MR. G. D. FABER: By paying for it.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: By paying people for having bought what others had no right to sell—an annual licence the renewal of which had to be annually applied for, which involved the possibility of its non-renewal. The nation had a right to have its control restored. It could not be deprived of its rights and powers because some people had recklessly speculated in licences.

*MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.) said the Prime Minister had not done justice in this matter to his unique power of exposition and analysis. He had told them that this was an academical discussion as to whether a time-limit was defensible, and he addressed the question to the Opposition whether or not that was so. But the Prime Minister forgot to look at the subsection which they were discussing. The question before the Committee was whether subsection (1) should be omitted, and subsection (1) provided that at the end of fourteen years all the results of a time-limit should accrue. Therefore they were not discussing a time-limit in the abstract, but a time-limit of fourteen years, after which period every licence was to become the property of the State. He desired also to refer to the phrase which so often fell from the lips of the Prime Minister as to whether or not it was within the right of the State to resume the monopoly which the State had created, but it had been paid for up to the hilt, it had been charged an annual rent for, and had been taxed to the extent of some £40,000,000 a year in one way or another. They heard of passive resisters who were reluctant to pay rates and taxes in respect of Acts of Parliament of which they did not approve, but they had yet to hear of a conscientious teetotaler who sent a little conscience money to the Chancellor of the Exchequer because he declined to recognise for his own benefit this iniquitous condition of the law. He had listened very attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spen Valley, who was to a large extent the real author of the measure. Should he incorrectly summarise it if he said it was this, that there had never been any property in a licence, that there had been at the utmost an expectation of renewal and nothing more, that even before 1904 there was no reason why justices should not reduce licences to their fullest desire, that the 1904 Act was quite unnecessary, and that although it was passed for the purpose of removing what was conceived by many to be an injustice, and although the entire financial burden fell upon the trade, it was still a fraud upon the community in some way, an immoral Act which this new Parliament was entitled—setting, he thought, a very dangerous precedent—to repeal almost before the ink in which it was printed was dry, thus inviting every subsequent Parliament, which came with a large automatic majority, to wipe out any legislation which had been passed by its predecessors, simply to appease a noisy section of its own supporters? The right hon. Gentleman, taking that view of the law, said that in 1891, so fully was the risk of the trade recognised, that the Licence Insurance Corporation was formed, and he had read portions of the prospectus—he said advisedly portions of the prospectus. He saw that prospectus before the right hon. Gentleman because he saw it before it was printed. The genesis of that corporation was this, that because everybody at that time thought Sharpe v. Wakefield had put a new aspect upon the position of the licensed victualler, whilst excitement was great in the trade in consequence of the House of Lords judgment, it was thought to be a reasonable thing that if there was no secure tenure in any kind of licence there should be formed an insurance corporation to protect licence-holders against the contingency of non-renewal of their licences. The right hon. Gentleman did not tell them that, so little did that view come to be generally accepted as the judgment came to be better understood, the corporation did practically no business.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: I should like to put the hon. Member right. The corporation was formed before the decision of the House of Lords, and has done considerable business and is doing it now.

*MR. BOTTOMLEY said the prospectus was written shortly before the decision—he was a little incorrect there—but when it was perfectly certain what the judgment of the House of Lords was likely to be. At any rate, it was after two other decisions in the First Instance Court and the Court of Appeal, and when Sharpe v. Wakefield was occupying very much the minds of the licensed community. As regarded doing business, he had heard of companies formed for one object doing business of a totally different character when it found that its original object did not appeal to the public. If the right hon. Gentleman told him seriously that the Licences Insurance Corporation was doing large business to-day in insuring licences per se he made a revelation which was absolute news to him. He wanted now to come to closer quarters with the right hon. Gentleman. He said that in 1891 there was no change in the law, that every man knew the law before and after 1891, and that a purblind public had invested its money in brewery enterprises and the trade had dishonestly shifted on to the shoulders of the public the security which they held. How long had that been the view of the right hon. Gentleman? If there was one man in the City of London more than another who was instrumental in spreading the theory amongst investors that licences were a secure investment even after Sharpe v. Wakefield, it was the Member for Spen Valley. He had had the privilege of a personal acquaintance with the right hon. Gentleman for many years past, and their first difference was in connection with a Local Parliament where the right hon. Gentleman wrecked his Cabinet by the introduction of a licensing Bill. Consequently he had kept his eye on him ever since and to-night he hoped to get "evens" with him. In 1891 and a short time before, the right hon. Gentleman occupied a very distinguished and responsible position as editor of a daily financial paper, and in that capacity he gave advice to the investing public as to the best security for their money. He had recently spent some little time in the British Museum looking up the advice given by the right hon. Gentleman in that now defunct organ of public opinion. If he could show that in 1891 the right hon. Gentleman thought licences were a secure and attractive investment, he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought at least to tell them what had happened since that time to change his view, and perhaps he would be willing to withdraw his opprobrium upon the purblind public who had invested their money in breweries. On 2nd July, 1891, he found the Member for Spen Valley telling a reader who sought his advice—

"In Guinness's brewery you have a good investment."

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: My hon. friend is quoting a number of things with which I had nothing to do, with which I had no connection, and over which I had no control, and they are not my answers in any shape or form.

*MR. BOTTOMLEY replied that if the right hon. Gentleman told him, as responsible editor of a great financial paper, he disclaimed responsibility for the financial advice given in that paper, if he exercised so little supervision over the staff, and paid so little attention to what his paper contained, then his authority on Acts of Parliament and upon the history of the licensing question would be seriously imperilled. He would put it in another way and say that in a financial paper, of which the right hon. Gentleman was the editor, one man was told that—

"In the Guinness brewery you have a good investment which we advise you to stick to."

In regard to Spier's & Ponds, the same organ said—

"There is not the slightest ground for any anxiety."

Without going through a lot of instances, it was stated, in regard to the Bodega, that—

"At the present price they are, in our opinion, extremely cheap."

And as for the Gordon Hotels, the advice was—

"These shares are worth looking after."

Then he came to a quotation which was amazing. There was an editorial article on a new issue, and the right hon. Gentleman could not disclaim responsibility for that, and he asked the Committee to listen to what the right hon. Gentleman thought in 1891—

"The shares of the Star Brewery Company, Cambridge, the brewery business of which has been established half-a-century, and now enjoys a high reputation in Cambridgeshire and the adjoining districts, are about to be offered to the public. We understand that the directorate consists of practical brewers, and that no less than three-quarters of the trade is tied."

They were the days when the right hon. Gentleman was carrying on the occupation of a sane, responsible, city man, with responsibility attaching to his advice, and when he was not wearing the mantle of the Party champion of temperance reform. He was in a position of greater freedom and less obligation to the Liberal Party. That showed that even after Sharpe v. Wakefield the Member for Spen Valley held the opinion that licences constituted a very sound security, and although he might disclaim responsibility for the minor items of advice which had been quoted, he could not for the editorial note just read. He had searched every page of the paper edited by the right hon. Gentleman, but had failed to find one word of warning to the investing public that they were putting their money into a highly speculative, immoral, dangerous and problematical security when they were buying brewery and licensed shares. He wanted merely to establish the fact, without going into personalities, that in 1891 the right hon. Member for Spen

Valley had assumed, like every other sane man at that time, that subject to good behaviour and reasonable requirements of the neighbourhood the dicta of the Law Lords in Sharpe v. Wakefield would prevail, and no bench of magistrates would, out of mere caprice, deprive a man of his livelihood. He would not speculate as to what had changed the views of the right hon. Gentleman. They had to consider whether, in any event, as the Prime Minister had put it, any time-limit was defensible. They had to consider whether in fourteen years time licences were to become the absolute property of the State, and whether every man who had invested his capital and labour in licences was to hand them over to the State in the name of monopoly. It assumed that the State was the best person to carry on the business of a licensed victualler. The operation of this Bill would make every Member of the House a potential licensed victualler. Personally, he had quite enough to do, and was not anxious to add to his obligations and responsibilities the functions of a licensed victualler, and he thought temperance reformers had plenty to do without assuming responsibilities of that kind. The vast army of respectable citizens who owned public-houses and were connected with them were overlooked, and nothing was now said about those who followed the advice of the financial press and invested their money in brewery companies. This was introducing a very dangerous element into the law. They would have another opportunity of reviewing the general principles of the Bill on the Third Reading, and all he asked the Committee now to say was that it was unreasonable, impolitic, and unjust, that at the end of fourteen years every licence now owned by private people should be handed back without any compensation to the State. That was the question at issue, and he was not going to say a word about the general argument, because they all knew the arguments for and against. They knew the question of administration, revenue, and everything else, and so far as the example of the Government went they knew that the Government, in the course of its business, sold a public-house a little while ago at its full market value, just before introducing this Bill. The War Secretary had told the hon. Member for York that the purchaser was perfectly satisfied with his bargain. He had in his possession a letter from the purchaser in which he said he was perfectly satisfied with his bargain at present, because he was certain that this Licensing Bill would never pass into law, and in that hope he begged to resume his seat.

COLONEL WALKER (Lancashire, Widnes) said that after what had been stated it was desirable that he should give to the House a short history of the Licences Insurance Company. That company was floated by a Mr. Lawson, whose methods of flotation at that time were not known, but they are known now. The Licences Insurance Company was floated and promoted by this man Lawson. His methods were rather peculiar and very clever. He drew into the folds of his prospectus a great many names of brewery companies as founders in his company by leaving with some clerk in the office a founder's share as a present. He then printed the names of the brewery companies on his prospectus. Having got together his board he issued his prospectus and floated the company without any meeting of the board. Seeing that this company was about to be introduced and regarding it as a somewhat dangerous venture, he (Colonel Walker) sought the advice of his co-directors as to whether it would be feasible for someone who was cognisant of brewery business to be on the board of that company. He therefore with the consent of his board got on to the board of the Licences Insurance Company to see what was going to take place. When he got there after the flotation of the company he found it of a very peculiar nature. The methods apparently were that this man Lawson succeeded in floating companies one after another with the money collected and brought in by the previous companies, and the first thing that he desired to do with the monies coming into him so successfully—he (Colonel Walker) did not say it was because he was on the board that he succeeded in getting rather more capital in this company than any other company —was to take that opportunity to float another company. He came to the board and desired them to invest the funds of the company in the new flotation which he was about to bring out. He (Colonel Walker) then saw the nature of the business and he practically took Mr. Lawson by the ears and led him downstairs. He never approached the board again. Having associated his (Colonel Walker's) name with that company he felt bound to see it through. He saw some people with good names and he informed them what he intended to do. He persuaded them to put more money into the company. He persuaded the members of the board to cut down the directors' fees and to invest the money which they held in Government securities. The next step was to engage a good and excellent manager. In the course of time while he remained on the board the business grew and developed into a thoroughly sound commercial venture—the only one ever floated by that man, however, that was alive at the present moment. Having put the company upon an excellent basis and seen it thoroughly established he resigned from the board and retired gracefully.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: The hon. Member was not present when I made my speech. I made no attack upon the company. I simply quoted from the prospectus in order to show that at that time the risk was known. I made no comments and I know nothing of the flotation.

*COLONEL WALKER: It was entirely a venture of the man Lawson. The company had nothing to do with "Sharpe and Wakefield," nor was it promoted by brewers.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.) said that although the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Spen Valley regarded this proposal as the backbone of the Bill, there was not a word about temperance in the subsection from first to last. He mentioned that in order to show that the importance with which the subsection was regarded by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite was not derived from the temperance point of view, but because it represented a purely fiscal transaction. It represented the setting-up of a state of things under which a different fiscal arrangement was to obtain from that which obtained at present. What was this fiscal arrangement? The arrangement was not as might be supposed from the Prime Minister's speech, something vague about a term of years called x, y, or z. It was that at the end of fourteen years licences, for which no compensation had been paid during the currency of that period, were to be taken away by the State, which he might remind the Committee was after all the largest profit-sharing partner in licences at the present moment. He thought the Prime Minister had hardly considered this scheme from the point of view of the unfortunate people on whom its operation was going to fall. He asked the Committee to look at the position of the licence-holder under the scheme of compensation on the one hand and of amortisation on the other, or what the right hon. Gentleman euphemistically called a scheme of double insurance. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spen Valley had drawn an analogy between this scheme and the insurance of a ship. He would point out that if the owner of a ship insured it for fourteen years he would still at the end of the period have the vessel, but under this scheme the holder of the licence would not still have the licence. That was where the fallacy of the right hon. Gentleman's argument was to be found. The Prime Minister might call it double insurance if he pleased, but he could not be surprised if others called it by a more appropriate and shorter title. He thought the Government scheme inexpedient and unjust. On the point of expediency it was said, on the broadest public grounds: "Here is a

Supposing it had been an error to grant monopolies in the past, why were they to draw the line at one particular monopoly? If they were going to correct these errors by expropriation of individuals now, why stop at the liquor trade? That observation had already occurred to hon. Gentlemen below the gangway. He read the other day in an issue of Justice, a sentence which seemed to sum up the argument which he had addressed to the Committee. That journal said—

“If it is sound policy to confiscate the property of some brewers in fourteen years why not all the brewers, all the manufacturers, and all the railways at the same time.”

[Cheers from LABOUR MEMBERS.] Hon. Members below the gangway cheered that, but would the Government say that? Of course, they would not; at least, he hoped they would not. As to the justice of the proposal, he reminded the Committee that the highest judicial authority in the land, namely, the present Lord Chancellor, in the course of the licensing debates in 1904, stated that the Bill did give fixity of tenure equivalent to fixity of tenure in land. That was not the view held by the framers of the Bill, but it was the view held by many who spoke from the Opposition side of the House at the time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spenn Valley had stated that a licence was only granted for one year. If that was so, why in the third schedule of this Bill did they look forward to a period of fifty-nine years? He ventured to say that point was worthy of consideration. The Government said they did not want confiscation. Some of his hon. friends, speaking with an intimate knowledge of the facts, had pointed out that the proposals of the Government were neither just nor feasible from the actuarial and statistical point of view, and they had brought facts and figures to show the ludicrous inadequacy of the proposals. What was the answer they got? They only got two answers. One was that there was a compensation scheme, and if that was not sufficient then there was the fact that they had had a warning. He asked was the compensation sufficient? From first to last in the course of the debates there had never been brought forward by the Government any statistical calculations whatever to give any support to that statement. They had been told from first to last that this time limit had been based upon no statistical calculation; that there was behind it no mathematical formulæ or inquiry. He thought that that was worth bearing in mind. He noticed that the Under-Secretary for the Home Department, with all his ingenuity in calculating every sum that he could possibly scrape together, could only succeed in making out that the total amount of capital reserve available to meet the loss—which the right hon. Member for the Spenn Valley put at £100,000,000—would be £51,000,000. He would not say anything about the morality of the suggestion that it was right to rob a man because a considerable proportion of his property was locked up in his estate. The Secretary of State for War had taken a different line in the country. He had stated at various public meetings that the Government did not want to do anything unfair and were quite ready to listen to any reasonable suggestion. He thought it was a little late in the day for the Secretary for War to say that; it would have been better if the right hon. Gentleman had made some answer as to the amount of money which the War Office got for a licensed house in Portsmouth. He was glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman was now prepared to say that the Government did not want to destroy the existing licences; but the promise and the performance did not run hand in hand. What the supporters of the Bill wished was the destruction of all value in licences. He would give a quotation to prove that. The present Lord Lochee said in a speech in 1904 that if the Liberal Party had a particle of courage they could defeat the Licensing Bill then under discussion, if it became law. They could defeat it by determining that the duties on all licences should no longer remain at the comparatively small standard at which they now stood; but that they should arrange them so that the value of all the licences would be destroyed. [MINISTERIAL cries of “Hear, hear.”] He was glad to hear that some hon. Members on the other side of the House had the courage of their convictions, and were prepared to admit that they wished to arrive at the total annihilation of the value of all licences. But the Secretary for War had no right to go up and down the country saying that the Government were not prepared to take away without compensation anybody's property, whatever shape that property might have. He came now to the last argument of the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley in regard to warning. That had even been suggested by the Prime Minister himself. That was a more curious doctrine than any other put forward by the right hon. Gentleman. According to it, killing was no murder if they gave a man warning before they killed him. He did not pretend to understand that argument. It was perilously near the argument of the buccaneer. But let them see about this warning. The case of Sharpe v. Wakefield had already been sufficiently dealt with by the hon. Member for Hackney from the legal point of view. Was it an accurate statement that these unfortunate licence-holders had been duly and properly warned? The only thing of that kind he could find was the Bill of 1895. But he could not read that as a warning. He was driven to the suspicion that when the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley and other speakers who agreed with him spoke of the licence-holders having had a warning, it was from the general attitude the Liberal Party had taken up in regard to this question. That confession was interesting, and he was not sure that it was not partly true. He was perfectly certain that if this section became part of the Bill it would be regarded by every prudent business man as a warning to set aside a sinking fund against the political vagaries of the Liberal Party.

*MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) said that the Committee had listened to various speeches from the Opposition side of the House in which hon. Members very forcibly, and in almost tragic tones, had set forth the sad fate in store for those interested in licensed property. He would ask the Committee to consider for a few minutes in a calm spirit what he thought would be the situation at the end of the proposed time-limit. First of all, they knew that compensation was to cease, and that the magisterial discretion as to the refusal of licences was to be restored. By the statutory process of reduction, one-third of the present licences would have been swept away—undoubtedly the worst of the houses and the least profitable. The remaining two-thirds would have a very valuable monopoly. The population would be increased, and the fewer licences would become more valuable than they were before. Again, there would be no compensation levy upon them, and that would be a relief to the trade. The number of licences being so reduced within a proper limit, there would be little or no risk of a further reduction either by Imperial legislation, magisterial decision, or popular control—a risk so small as to be insured against on the easiest terms.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London): When is that good time coming?

AN HON. MEMBER (on the MINISTERIAL Benches): It is here now.

*MR. TOMKINSON said he was describing what would be the situation at the end of the time-limit. There would be the enhanced value of the licences which would accrue to the remaining licences. He understood that the practical form which the payment for the monopoly value of the licence would take, would be that an adequate sum would be paid for the privilege of holding a licence—a payment which hitherto had been wholly nominal. Some hon. Members insisted that that would be confiscation and robbery; but it was only a reasonable thing for the State to ask at the end of fourteen years. He did not know the cases to which the hon. Member for Stepney alluded when he spoke of publicans being turned out of their houses and deprived of their property by this clause. The only cases he knew of this kind were when tenants of tied houses were so treated by brewer landlords. He saw no reason why anyone interested in public-house property should be so frightened as they seemed to be. He asked what was the cause of all those fears about confiscation? They were either not real or largely exaggerated. He would give the Committee an instance for which he could give chapter and verse so that anyone could ascertain the truth and accuracy of his statement. A month ago he was travelling to the town of Nuneaton on business and on his way a Birmingham newspaper was put into his hands containing the report of a sale at public auction of a licensed house in Nuneaton which was knocked down for £10,100. He went to the auctioneer who conducted the sale and asked him if the newspaper report was correct, and the auctioneer said that it was. He asked what were the circumstances and the history of the house, and the reply was that the house was a hotel of no very great value and on which no great amount of money had been spent. Some years ago it had been sold by auction for £4,000, and the purchaser sold it again for £3,600, or at a loss of £400. It had been put up to auction again the previous day and knocked down for £10,100. Then he asked the auctioneer what was the value of the house in itself, apart from the monopoly value, and the answer was £4,000, and that the man had given £10,100 for it with his eyes open, was in the trade, and knew that this Bill was going to pass.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington) thought that the speech to which they had just listened showed that a very large number of Members of the House had not the slightest idea, after the statement of the Prime Minister, what monopoly value was. He had listened to the right hon. Gentleman's speech on that occasion and had read his speeches in the papers, and it appeared to him to be perfectly plain that at the end of fourteen years no man who held a licensed house was to have any interest in the value of the licence itself at all. That, of course, did away with all the arguments as to values put forward by the hon. Member opposite. It was understood some years ago that a time-limit meant that after a certain period the majority of people in a certain locality would have the opportunity of stating whether they would or would not have a public-house in that locality. This Bill was totally different in every respect from that. At the end of a certain period the value of the licence was to belong to the State. Suppose, for example, there were works which employed a large number of men, and there was adjacent to those works one public-house which was worth £10,000 with a licence and about £1,500 without a licence—not an extraordinary case. At the end of ten years, if the licence was to depend on the majority of votes, that house would be worth £10,000, because there would not be the slightest possibility of the majority of the people in that locality wishing to take away the value of the licence. But in this case, at the end of fourteen years, the £8,500 was to belong to the State, and the man would be left with £1,500, the value of the house. He hoped the Government would say if he was not correct in his view of the matter. As to the value of the property which was selling at the present time, it was perfectly plain that the value depended on the opinion of the purchaser as to whether or not this Bill was going to pass into law.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield) wished to say a word or two upon a point which did not seem to have been touched on, but which had reference to an injustice to licence-holders. He wished to do this, although he was a strong temperance advocate, because the point had arisen in his division, and not he thought in any other part of the country. In the parish in which he lived an application was made to the bench of magistrates for a licence for a public-house. They fixed the monopoly value of the licence based on the Act of 1904 at £9,000. There was an appeal to Quarter Sessions, and that Court reduced the sum to £8,000. Now the licence-holder to whom they granted that licence had paid into the county funds 8,000 sovereigns, and the Government had no right, therefore, he contended, under the provisions of Section 3, to treat that man as if he were in the same position as an ordinary licence-holder. He came in under the Act of 1904; on the faith of that Act, he paid £8,000 into the county fund, and it would be grossly unjust to ask that a man who had provided compensation for all the other licences in the village—because there were a number of others of very great value—with his £8,000 in the county fund beside the value of the building—£6,000 or £8,000—to pay compensation to the other holders and lose the £8,000.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir S. EVANS, Glamorganshire, Mid): Was that licence granted for seven years?

MR. MARKHAM: There was no condition attached to it.

SIR S. EVANS said that under the Act of 1904 the justices could have granted an annual licence, or they could have granted one for seven years.

MR. MARKHAM said that with all respect to the Solicitor-General, he thought he was wrong in that definition of the law. He was present during the passing of the Act, and although the Solicitor-General and his predecessor on the other side held opposite views on every conceivable point, he did not know of that provision.

SIR S. EVANS read a subsection of the Act of 1904 to the effect that the justices might, if they thought fit, make the grant of a licence annual, or grant a licence for a term not exceeding seven years.

MR. MARKHAM said he was afraid he could not argue the point with the Solicitor-General without referring to the Act, but from what the hon. and learned Gentleman said, they seemed to have acted illegally. At all events they had had £8,000 from this licence-holder on the ground that, as they thought, they were granting him a perpetual licence. That might not be so, and if that was not the state of the law he did not wish to raise the point.

SIR F. BANBURY said the hon. Member for Crewe seemed to hold a different view as to the result of this Bill from that which was held by some other hon. Members who sat on that side of the House, because only a short time ago his hon. friend the Member for West Lanark quoted a speech made a few years ago by Lord Lochee, to the effect that the value of a licence ought to be destroyed altogether. That sentiment was received with cheers in more than one quarter on the other side of the House, but the hon. Member for Crewe had conjured out of his mind a golden state of affairs which was going to exist under this Bill, by which houses worth £4,000 now were to be worth £10,000 or more at the end of fourteen years, and large sums of money were going to be made by the fortunate people who would survive till that moment. Take the statement that £10,000 was given for a house, as his hon. friend had just observed, the value naturally would depend upon whether or not the purchaser thought that this Bill was going to pass into law. As his hon. friend knew, he had had some connection with the City, and his opinion had been asked on several occasions as to what people ought to do who had invested their money in brewers' securities, preference or ordinary. He had stated that in the present depressed state of the market he should keep his stock, not that he thought this Bill was going to make it more valuable, but because he believed there was another place where confiscation would not prevail or be sanctioned. The hon. Member said that between now and the end of fourteen years a certain number of houses would disappear, and the owners of those houses would receive ample compensation, and that if they reduced the number of houses they increased the price of the remaining houses. That was a curious argument to come from a temperance reformer who thought this Bill was brought in to promote temperance. The hon. Member thought the same amount of liquor would be sold. ["No."] Well, the hon. Member's remarks were in the recollection of the House, and he distinctly understood him to say that as the result of certain holders of licences being done away with, additional business would come to the remainder, and, if so, that the remaining houses would be sold for something about the same figure. But his hon. friend forgot altogether that at the end of fourteen years these people would not remain; they were going to be done away with, and they would have disappeared altogether, so that those who remained would have to pay a monopoly value. It was curious what different defences were brought forward for this Bill by different Members, some Members honestly saying it was going to bring about temperance reform, while others said it was going to bring an abounding revenue to the State. That was what the Under-Secretary for the Home Department said, but what would his hon. friend, who was in the City some years ago, if there was going to be an abounding revenue and they were going to supply a sufficient sum to pay those from whom licences were taken away, give for a licence under those circumstances? If they were east of Temple Bar he was sure the offer he would make would be very small indeed. The Prime Minister had said that he (Sir F. Banbury) would consider any time-limit absurd, and that no time-limit was just. The right hon. Gentleman was quite right in attributing that to him, but, of course, when he said no time-limit would be sufficient he was referring to the conditions of the Bill. If the Prime Minister proposed to withdraw the Bill, however, and to say to licence-holders that he would give them fifty years without any conditions whatever, then he would not say that that sort of time-limit would not be possible. There were two points which the Committee had to consider on this particular subsection—one was whether or not the result of this clause would be just, and whether they were dealing with the property of other people in the same way as they would deal with their own property. He was quite sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not want to do for the property of others what they would not do for their own. The other was, were they going to establish or promote temperance by this particular form of legislation? The Prime Minister had stated that there was nothing but an expectation in a licence, that the licence was granted for a year, but that there had grown up in the minds of the public an expectation that under certain circumstances, that licence would be renewed. He had a statement in his hand by Sir Ralph Littler, a very prominent lawyer, which bore upon that point. Sir Ralph Littler said that any private individual who went to a Court of Equity and claimed to resume possession of a property after it had been in the possession of someone else for 150 years, no matter how fairly he had it originally, would be told that he could not have possession. He said 150 years because some of these licences were granted before 1817, and many had been in existence for 100 or 150 years. If in the case of ordinary property, which had been in the possession of a man and that man's father and grandfather for 150 years, though the first holder had no right that could be maintained in a Court of Law, the man could not be dispossessed, then on what ground could the Government come forward and say that the State should resume this property because it had made a mistake and should never have parted with it? The thing was absurd. If he bought a house of his hon. friend for £150 which was only worth £50 and thus committed an error of judgment, and he asked his friend to give him back £100, on the ground that he had made a mistake, the hon. Gentleman would not give it. If the State had made a mistake how could they come down now and say: "We have made a mistake. We have allowed people to spend their money in a business which we have legitimised, and we are going to take it back? Because it must be remembered that the trade had been legitimised by the State in granting the licences. No one would suggest that the Government ought to profit by money obtained from an iniquitous business. It was, therefore, inconceivable that anybody should advance the argument that because there was a revenue now to be obtained from this legitimate trade which the State had sanctioned the State should now resume possession of it. It would be exactly the same as if he had made a present to the City of a piece of land as a public park. Would his descendants 100 years hence, when that land had been greatly increased in value, have a right to say that he did not know that the land would become so valuable when he parted with it, and consequently it must be restored to them? Yet that was what hon. Gentlemen opposite were trying to make the State do, and it was because the vast majority of the English people believed that no sane Parliament could possibly pass such a Bill that the value of these houses had not depreciated so much as they would have done if it had been possible for a moment to believe that this Bill would be passed into law. During the debates in the summer some quotations were made by the right hon. Gentleman from speeches by the late Mr. Gladstone to prove that after the decision in Sharpe v. Wakefield, Mr. Gladstone had rather altered his views on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman had not, however, quoted the whole speech, because Mr. Gladstone went on to say, and this was far more important, that the expressions he used were not directed to the measure then before the House, but to a general and sweeping measure for the extinction of all public-houses. That would seem to show that Mr. Gladstone even after the decision in Sharpe v. Wakefield still held the same opinion. Under those circumstances the Committee was entitled to assume that had Mr. Gladstone been alive he would not have been a party to a measure of this description. What would be the effect of the reduction of licences if that reduction were accomplished in the way it would be if this clause was carried? Was it going to have any effect on temperance? He did not know whether hon. Members had seen the statistics of convictions for intemperance which had been taken out for the county of Middlesex. There it was shown that the proportion of population to licences had nothing whatever to do with intemperance. In one case there were 694 people to a licence, and the number of convictions for drunkenness 8.5. In another there were ninety-four people to a licence, and the number of convictions was 6.7, and the same thing went all the way through the statistics. That was a very striking commentary upon the argument that the reduction of licences was going to affect the question of temperance. He thought the question that was asked in the House recently by the hon. Member for Hackney with regard to the money which was received from the sale of drink showed the true method in which to bring about temperance reform. Example was the proper thing, and the education of the people to the fact that it would be better for themselves and their families if they spent less on drink than they did at the present moment. Temperance reform would not be accomplished by robbing the brewers or the proprietors of licensed houses; and that was what would take place if Parliament passed this clause into law. It was hardly necessary to refer to the prospectus which had been read out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spen Valley. The answer made by the hon. Member for Hackney and another hon. Member who was not now in the House had been sufficient. But the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley in reading the prospectus had given a false impression to the House. He gave the impression that it was a company got up by the brewers for their own protection. On looking at that prospectus, however, he found that the shareholders in it were the ordinary public, and what had really happened was that a few sharp men of business, seeing that the decision in Sharpe v. Wakefield was not going to injure licensed property thought there was an opportunity of playing on the fears of the people, and of bringing out a company to insure licences at no risk but great profit to themselves.

*MR. BOULTON (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey) said one very important point had been made in the course of the debate, and that was the clear statement of the Leader of the Opposition that licences were something less than freehold. It had been argued a great many times previously by the brewers that licences were freehold.

MR. YOUNGER: No, no.

*MR. BOULTON: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. From this afternoon we have this clear—

MR. YOUNGER: Can the hon. Gentleman give an authority for his statement?

*MR. BOULTON: It has been said on hundreds of platforms.

MR. YOUNGER: Nothing of the kind.

*MR. BOULTON said the hon. Gentleman had only to go out into the streets and he would see in almost every public-house in London staring placards stating that if this Bill passed, no property was safe. The only inference that could be drawn from that was that licences were private property. They now had it, at any rate from the Leader of the Opposition, that these licences were something less than freehold, but they had also evidence at least from certain of the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that some of them did not follow their Leader. The mover of the Amendment had stated that these licensed properties had been treated by the Inland Revenue as freeholds, and had quoted, in the course of his argument, the Inland Revenue instructions of 1890. He had those instructions in his hand and he would just read two lines upon which the argument was based. Referring to the assessment of public-houses for the purposes of levying the death duties, they stated that in each case it was assumed that the licence would continue to be renewed. That was the statement which was made in order to support the argument that the Inland Revenue had been in the habit of treating licences as freehold, and that they should continue to be so treated by the State. In the year when that document was issued, the opinion of the Solicitor-General of the Conservative Government, Sir Edward Clarke, was to the effect that licences must be renewed, subject only to misconduct; that the holders had a legal right, when they came to the magistrates for a renewal of their licences, to have that application granted. That was the opinion of Sir Edward Clarke in 1890, when that precious document was issued which gave instructions to the Inland Revenue to value these licences on the basis of continued renewal. Then came the case of Sharpe v. Wakefield in 1891, the year after Sir Edward Clarke gave his opinion. In that case the House of Lords decided that the justices had an absolute judicial discretion to refuse the renewal of any licence. When that decision was given, Sir Edward Clarke admitted that he had made a mistake in his interpretation of the law, which had been decided by the highest Court of Appeal in the country. Then something else happened. The Death Duties Act of 1894 was passed, and that Act stated how an assessment of property for the purpose of valuation should be made. In 1904 they had other instructions issued by the Inland Revenue authorities stating what had been, not what was to be, the practice for the last ten or twelve years. These instructions stated that there was no special basis provided by statute for valuing licensed houses for the purpose of estate duty, and that accordingly they came under the general rule applicable to all property. Then it went on to say that the principal value of any property should be estimated at the price which in the opinion of the Commissioners such property would fetch if sold in the open market. In face of that, was it not dishonest to circularise broadcast the instructions of 1890?

MR. YOUNGER: I know that in practice the valuations resulting from the second paper are exactly the same as from the first.

*MR. BOULTON asked if the hon. Gentleman would give his authority for saying that. The hon. Member could not produce any authority. He was going to show that he was wrong by producing the authority of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, as quoted by Treasury officials. After the 1890 instructions were issued the whole position surely was changed by the decision in Sharpe v. Wakefield. That decision altered what was considered to have been the law. What did Mr. Candy, the leading counsel for the trade in that great case, say? Not only Mr. Candy but other permanent trade officials admitted that Sharpe v. Wakefield had seriously interfered with the value of licensed houses. Surely the market was affected by that, and surely after Sharpe v. Wakefield the market value would be something less than that of freehold. Yet the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs came and said that Sharpe v. Wakefield made no difference in the value of licensed property.

MR. YOUNGER: I did not. It has increased since then very much.

*MR. BOULTON said that if it had increased since then it was perhaps because of the increase in the population. He, however, thought the hon. Member was wrong. So far as his knowledge of the trade went, the value of licensed property had fallen very much. Some licensed houses in his own constituency were not worth nearly what they were twenty or thirty years ago, and that he believed was the case generally throughout the country. By Sharpe v. Wakefield licensees were declared not to be freeholders. The opinion given by Sir Edward Clarke in 1890 when the instructions were issued was not good law, and for the brewers to issue the 1890 instructions, after that decision, and after the passing of the Death Duties Act, was nothing less than a bare-faced and impudent fraud upon the public. He wanted an authoritative expression or statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the practice of levying the tax for the purposes of the death duties was based on the 1904 instructions and not upon those of 1890, and last July he wrote a letter to that right hon. Gentleman asking if he were right in assuming that the 1890 instructions were not acted upon. He got the following reply—

“I am desired by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to inform you that the Paper of 1890 was issued before Sharpe v. Wakefield was decided by the House of Lords and before the passing of the Finance Act. The Paper of 3rd May, 1904, states the practice followed under the Finance Act.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer quoted the practice, and then went on to say—

“You are correct in your impression that the Somerset House authorities did not act on the 1890 instructions much later than 1891 or 1892, and that the instructions in 1904 were those which had been acted upon for ten years or more.”

That emphatic declaration, coming from the head of the Treasury, was the highest authority that the 1890 instructions should be disregarded and that the 1904 instructions were the only instructions they should look to. It was nothing less than dishonest to buy copies of those 1890 instructions wholesale and distribute them throughout the country as the trade had been doing. An hon. Member had quoted a statement from a pamphlet issued by Sir Ralph Littler attacking the Bill, in which Sir Ralph had stated that if a private individual who had allowed somebody else to use his property for 150 years went to a Court of Equity and asked to be restored to his property he would be laughed at. That was not the case with regard to licences at all. The licence-holders might have had them for 150 years, but they had paid rent to the State and had also applied annually for renewal, a very different thing. If an owner had allowed somebody to use his property for 150 years and had received rent each year in acknowledgment of his rights of ownership, and if he went to a Court of Equity there could be no question that that Court would hand him back the property which belonged to him. That disposed entirely of the suggestion of Sir Ralph Littler. He considered he had established what they had heard declared from the Leader of the Opposition, that licences were something considerably less than freehold.

*MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) said he had not been able to follow the arguments of the hon. Member. He had sat for many years as a close colleague of Sir Ralph Littler, and there was no man living who had had his experience in the administration of the licensing laws, and who, at the head of the Bar of England, had a greater knowledge of that law. They had listened to a bit of special pleading on the part of the hon. Member, but there were a great many gaps in the information he had vouchsafed to the House. When the hon. Member talked about a statement distributed throughout the country, he supposed he meant a statement issued by the trade and exhibited on licensed premises. The hon. Members said it was a barefaced impudent fraud. He could not help expressing astonishment that such a statement should come from an hon. Member on the other side of the House, considering that the Government's majority was obtained by methods such as the Chinese slavery falsehoods and other fraudulent misrepresentations, equally barefaced and impudent. This was the first time Parliament had attempted to do anything in the direction of confiscation of property, and he hoped it would meet with treatment elsewhere that would prevent this House turning along the same road again. It was not a mere question of paying an annual sum of money for an annual permission which might be withdrawn at the end of the year. Had hon. Members opposite ever heard of the basis upon which public-houses were assessed? Did they not know that skilled valuers were employed for the purpose of getting at the assessment? Valuers not only went into the broad question of what was to be the mean basis of compensation, or what the premises would let for if used for purposes other than that of a public-house, but they actually went so far as to ascertain the number of barrels of beer consumed during the year, and they based their valuation upon the business done by the publican irrespective of the actual value of the premises. Surely that was putting upon the licensed victualler an additional and very substantial income-tax, which involved not only a very high assessment, but an oppressive payment—because in addition to the ordinary income-tax under Schedule D, and also the payment of his licence duty, the holder had to pay heavily to the poor law and local authorities. In districts where the rates were high—and in some localities they were 10s. in the £—the rates amounted to a very considerable sum. In his own constituency there was a licensed house which had a hall attached, in which not long ago he addressed a meeting upon the Licensing Bill, and he asked if there was any man in the audience who could tell him what the premises were rated at. The assistant overseer, who happened to be present, replied: “£345 a year.” He then asked what was the value of the premises for rating purposes, assuming they were used for any other purpose, and the reply he got was “£120 a year.” That licence-holder had been paying rates on the difference between £345 and £120 for years. There was also the water rate charged upon the highly assessed rateable value, and these constituted an enormous charge placed upon the trade. Did any hon. Member dispute that those heavy charges which were made annually upon licensed premises were made because the licence was regarded as a permanent factor in the case? The Memorandum of 1890 was not an instruction, as the hon.

land Revenue to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the basis upon which they had levied the death duties in the past. The way licensed property had been treated by the Board of Inland Revenue clearly showed that they had always regarded premises as being permanently enhanced by the licence.

MR. BOULTON: It was based on bad law.

*MR. NIELD asked if his hon. friend had forgotten that Sections 30 and 31 of the Act of 1872 enacted that the holder of a licence should be entitled to a renewal of his licence unless some objection was taken to it? Had he forgotten that in 1873 the Act was so amended that any person desiring to oppose an existing licence was obliged to give notice in writing to the licensee that he intended to appear at the Licensing Sessions to oppose the renewal, and moreover to give in writing the grounds of his objection? Those provisions were inserted in the Licensing Act which regulated renewals of licences in 1872 and 1873, and the Act clearly stated that a licensee need not apply for his licence unless it was opposed, and then he had to receive proper notice. This was a deliberate indication that Parliament considered that licences should in practice be annually renewed in the absence of any misconduct on the part of the holder. He challenged the hon. Member who had last spoken or any Member of the Government of which he was a supporter to prove that the Inland Revenue to-day, in levying death duties upon persons interested in licensed premises, had abated one jot of the principle on which they went when the Memorandum of 1890 was issued. The hon. Member had quoted from a paper which he said was the instruction of 1890, but which he (the speaker) claimed was in fact nothing of the sort, but a statement of the basis of the then existing levy for death duties on licensed premises. The hon. Member had not mentioned that in the document the Commissioners of Inland Revenue had specifically said in at least two instances the premises was as permanently increased. Were hon.

freehold. But so much had been made of that admission that one was led to imagine that in the opinion of some hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House there was practically no property if it was not a freehold, and that they might take liberties with the property of anybody, so long as it was not freehold. That was a very striking doctrine. Then a great point had been made of the Memorandum of the Inland Revenue Commissioners in 1890, as if they based on that Memorandum the whole of their contention with reference to property in annual licences. That was only an incident in the case, and although it might be that that Memorandum had not been in effect since 1891 or 1892, it must be perfectly obvious that many thousands of pounds had been paid to the State in respect of that Memorandum during the period it was in force, and with respect to property which, since that time, had been handed down from one to another, property which really was affected by every line of the measure under consideration. Whatever changes had been made in the methods of the Inland Revenue with reference to the taxation of licensed property for death duty, those changes had not been of a very wide-reaching character. Indeed, it was significant to observe that hon. Gentlemen opposite exhibited very little anxiety to answer the challenge thrown out to them as to whether they would be willing to agree to compensation on the basis of the present methods of the Inland Revenue. He had said it was not only on the question of the methods of the Inland Revenue Commissioners that the contention was put forward as to the property value in these licences. In practice, the expectation of the renewal of these annual licences had amounted to a certainty, except, of course, in cases of misconduct. The custom of such renewals had endured for 400 years, and a custom of such antiquity and such a universal custom might reasonably be regarded by many as tantamount to law. It was because that custom had been so regarded that prudent men of business had not hesitated to invest their capital, and the capital of others for whom they had been trustees, in public-houses and other licensed property. An annual licence, which the Prime Minister had described as a precarious privilege, was not an unusual institution in this country. It was not only in the liquor trade that they found the annual licence. The instance had been given of the licence granted to theatres. What man would build a theatre and go to the expense of providing the public with a great institution like that if he did not anticipate that the licence would be renewed in the following year? There were Members of this House who had invested their money in motor cars, for which they got an annual licence. What man would buy a motor car if he had any doubt as to the renewal of the licence next year? There were many Members of the House who ought to be present now, but were away with guns for which they had only an annual licence. In fact, all these sorts of licences had been precarious privileges of one year's duration, but it had been the general understanding that they would be renewed at the expiration of each year. It was not only by the practice of the Inland Revenue Commissioners that a belief in the continuity of the licence had been created. The Courts had recognised the continuity of these annual licences. Time and again tenants for life had been restrained from suppressing licences to the injury, not only of their immediate successors, but even of remote remainder men. The magistrates had recognised the continuity of these licences, and had required publicans to make costly alterations and improvements in the interest of the public whom they served—alterations and improvements which would have been ruinous to the licence holder if he had held his licence for only one year. Local authorities throughout the land had for years recognised the principle of the continuity of these licences in their assessments on public-house property, and in fixing compensation when such property had been taken over for public improvements. It was in his own recollection that the London County Council was particularly generous in that respect, for it paid full compensation on public-house property which it had cleared in the course of public improvements, even when in its zeal for temperance, having paid the price of the licensed property, it promptly allowed the licences to lapse. Trustees had also it were conveying a freehold, and the amount at which the duty was assessed was not the mere value of the bricks and mortar, but the value of the house as permanently increased by the value of the licence. They paid an ad valorem duty of 10s. per cent. every time they changed hands. The Prime Minister speaking recently at Leeds had stated that the Bill was going to be a remedy for unemployment. It appeared from information furnished to him by one gentleman alone, who was engaged as an architect almost wholly in respect of licensed premises, that to his knowledge the Bill had already caused the abandonment or postponement of works upon which £28,000 would have been spent, quite apart from the fearful loss of wages which would have been paid by builders and contractors. His informant wrote—

"We, as constructional engineers, have, of course, suffered severely. Out of the £28,000, our work would really total at about £4,000. Of this amount wages would be by far the larger proportion."

He might safely say that of the £28,000 one-half would have been spent in wages. The indirect loss of wages was still larger since it would have been multiplied in the case of the firms who supplied steel girders, rivets and bolts, besides brick-makers, quarrymen and carriers. From the same source he learnt that a builder, generally engaged on licensed premises, who had from 500 to 700 hands, had owing to the Licensing Bill shut down his yard entirely, and could do no more work. He could multiply this very materially. He had a statement of the wages paid by electricians doing work wholly for licensed premises.

AN HON. MEMBER: Is not this altogether outside the question under discussion?

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CALDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid.): I do not understand that the hon. Gentleman is going much further.

*MR. NIELD said he could very well understand that this was most unpalatable to hon. Members when they saw the unemployed in the streets. When the House was besieged by the unemployed, surely it was most germane to give the House this information as he was about to do when interrupted. One firm of electrical engineers, whose wages were during the preceding year £1,600, paid only £979 last year—a loss of £621 in one small branch. Another firm reported a loss of £9,000 worth of work, of which half would represent wages. A decorator's bill had shrunk from £669 to £268 in a corresponding period of seven months. The figures he had given had been from one source out of twenty similar ones, and he was assured it was quite reasonable to regard this as a fair average of those twenty. The Bill was a disastrous one for the workers. It would increase unemployment. While the State had a right to regulate, it had no right to confiscate, and this clause ought to be eliminated.

*MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet) said that whatever diversity of views might have been urged in support of the measure, the Committee had been left in no doubt as to the test which it should apply in considering the Amendment now before them. The Prime Minister had told them that in judging of the merits of the Amendment they should consider whether the policy embodied in the clause was sound, politic and just. Nobody who had listened to the debate could have any doubt for a moment that that policy was not financially sound, nor commercially just. Whether it was politic must depend upon the point of view. It might be politic from the point of view of the Party and its exigencies, but he had very serious doubt as to whether it was politic from the point of view of the nation or of its interests. The policy which the clause embodied was that with which they were all familiar, the policy of denying to the licensed trade that it had any claim to compensation when licences were suppressed, upon the ground that there had never been any legal right to the renewal of an annual licence, or any claim to fixity of tenure, but only an expectation. It was surprising to find the delight with which the admission from those benches that an annual licence was not a freehold was received. He did not imagine anybody ever supposed an annual licence was a freehold. But so much had been made of that admission that one was led to imagine that in the opinion of some hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House there was practically no property if it was not a freehold, and that they might take liberties with the property of anybody, so long as it was not freehold. That was a very striking doctrine. Then a great point had been made of the Memorandum of the Inland Revenue Commissioners in 1890, as if they based on that Memorandum the whole of their contention with reference to property in annual licences. That was only an incident in the case, and although it might be that that Memorandum had not been in effect since 1891 or 1892, it must be perfectly obvious that many thousands of pounds had been paid to the State in respect of that Memorandum during the period it was in force, and with respect to property which, since that time, had been handed down from one to another, property which really was affected by every line of the measure under consideration. Whatever changes had been made in the methods of the Inland Revenue with reference to the taxation of licensed property for death duty, those changes had not been of a very wide-reaching character. Indeed, it was significant to observe that hon. Gentlemen opposite exhibited very little anxiety to answer the challenge thrown out to them as to whether they would be willing to agree to compensation on the basis of the present methods of the Inland Revenue. He had said it was not only on the question of the methods of the Inland Revenue Commissioners that the contention was put forward as to the property value in these licences. What man would buy a motor car if he had any doubt as to the renewal of the licence next year? There were many Members of the House who ought to be present now, but were away with guns for which they had only an annual licence. In fact, all these sorts of licences had been precarious privileges of one year's duration, but it had been the general understanding that they would be renewed at the expiration of each year. It was not only by the practice of the Inland Revenue Commissioners that a belief in the continuity of the licence had been created. The Courts had recognised the continuity of these annual licences. Time and again tenants for life had been restrained from suppressing licences to the injury, not only of their immediate successors, but even of remote remainder men. The magistrates had recognised the continuity of these licences, and had required publicans to make costly alterations and improvements in the interest of the public whom they served—alterations and improvements which would have been ruinous to the licence holder if he had held his licence for only one year. Local authorities throughout the land had for years recognised the principle of the continuity of these licences in their assessments on public-house property, and in fixing compensation when such property had been taken over for public improvements. It was in his own recollection that the London County Council was particularly generous in that respect, for it paid full compensation on public-house property which it had cleared in the course of public improvements, even when in its zeal for temperance, having paid the price of the licensed property, it promptly allowed the licences to lapse. Trustees had also recognised the continuity of licences by investing large sums in public-house property on the strength of the practical and moral certainty of renewals. What was the justification for the contention that there was no claim for compensation now? It was admitted that there was a claim for compensation in regard to licences which were forfeited within the time-limit period. They had got thus far in regard to the right of compensation. It was only those which survived the time-limit which were to have no compensation at all, and yet it was those which survived that period which would have the best claim. They would of necessity be the best class of houses, for the least desirable would certainly go first. The houses which survived, those which were fittest, would have paid the compensation even for the least desirable houses which had been exterminated. He would remind the Committee that it was not only private rights but equally public policy which was here involved. If a man who was paying during a period of years to a compensation fund for his neighbours, with the certainty that if he survived he would in his time get no compensation at all, what could they expect that man to do in the upkeep of his house? What could they expect that man to do in the way of liberal and effective expenditure upon necessary improvements and alterations? That man, knowing that his trade was doomed and that his days were numbered, would neglect so far as he possibly could every expenditure of money and confine all his energies to push sales to make his money while the little sun left to him still shone. It was really worth while for their temperance friends to consider what would be the state of public-houses at the end of the allotted period. When the new era began these unfortunate licence-holders, after their long and costly experience, would have to pay again the monopoly value which their own capital and labour had created. This would really be taxing the tenants on their own improvements and the taxation would be large in proportion to the expenditure which they had made. The time-limit meant the rejection at the end of the allotted period of all claim to a renewal of licences and all claim to compensation. He did not think that in the course of the debate anyone had pointed out exactly the financial meaning of that, not to the licence-holders but to the innocent investors who had their money in brewery companies. He asked the Committee to consider what a brewery company could do to provide against loss on the part of its shareholders and debenture-holders at the end of the time-limit. He would illustrate this by one case which he had taken from the excellent work by Mr. Pratt, who was a great authority on this point. Mr. Pratt gave the case of a long-established brewery company which traded in beer only, eight-tenths of its output going to tied houses purchased by the company. The average net profit available for dividends on the ordinary shares was £12,600. If the whole of this profit were put annually to a Sinking Fund for twenty-one years at 3 per cent. it would produce £360,000. The sums to be provided for out of such fund would be as follows:—Mortgage debentures, mortgages, etc., £354,000; preference shares, £174,000; ordinary shares (present value), £200,000; pension fund (for 200 employees), £10,000; making a total of £738,000. But inasmuch as the Sinking Fund would produce only £360,000, there would be a deficit of £378,000 in meeting all these items. The shareholders would have gone without dividends for twenty-one years, and all provision for old-age pensions and retiring allowances would be absolutely swallowed up. That was one of hundreds of cases of a similar kind which might be cited. On the authority of Mr. Buxton, Chairman of Truman, Buxton & Company, he stated that securities based on licence values, amounting to £150,000,000, would be rendered practically valueless if the Amendment now before the Committee were rejected. That was the case with regard to the holders of freehold properties; but the case was as bad, perhaps worse, with regard to leasehold properties. There were many cases in this country where the owners of licensed premises had purchased the lease of fifty years, and spent all their capital and all the money they could raise on their credit in building up a great business. He was not speaking now of public-houses or gin palaces, as they had been described. He was speaking of respectable hotels which came under the operation of this

which had been made for new licences from 1904; when he saw traders having to pay £5,000 down for a new licence, he said that that would cause the expectation of renewal which would constitute a practical embarrassment a few years hence, and he wanted to guard against the recurrence of the compensation difficulty. There was one criticism he would like to make in connection with the present proposal. Whilst he understood quite clearly the end towards which it proceeded, he doubted very much whether the present time-limit proposal would secure the end aimed at unless subsequently there was associated with it some new condition covering the tenure of licences, which would prevent the compensation difficulty or the expectation of renewal. For his own part, he did not think that anything except the institution of some form of public tender, such as proposed by Mr. Bruce, would guarantee the community against the recurrence at some future time of this compensation difficulty. But before he sat down there was one aspect of this question which had not been touched on, but to which he thought it was very desirable to allude. They heard a great deal concerning the injustice of this time-limit proposal. The injustice of it had always been construed to be in the treatment of the licensed trader, but he would like to ask hon. Members opposite whether there was not involved in this time-limit proposal a very distinct and definite injustice to the community at large. What was the price which the community was called upon to pay for this time-limit concession to "the trade"? He did not know whether it had been quite realised by hon. Members on the opposite side the financial price which the country had to pay for this concession of the time-limit. It was obvious that during the whole currency of the time-limit, i.e., for the whole period of fourteen years, there could be no adjustment of licence taxation to the real value of the licence. That was to say, that for the whole period of the time-limit the community must forego any increased taxation on licences. When he remembered the amount which was due from the licensed trade, he realised the amount which the community had to pay for this time-limit. Contrasting this taxation with the taxation of the same trade in other countries, which represented conditions which in all essentials were identical with the conditions encountered here, he began to understand the real price that the country would have to pay for this generous concession to the licensed trade. He did not want to weary the Committee with figures, but he would give them one or two. Take the whole of the towns in the United Kingdom, with a population exceeding 30,000 persons—the average payment by the publican for a licence was £27 a year. Take towns in the United States of America of the same size, and the average payment made by the publican was £147 a year. Let him give another case. London to-day received from its liquor licences £275,000 a year, but if London received for them in proportion to population, the sum received from the publicans of New York she would receive just over £3,000,000 annually. The difference between the yield of the duties on our existing scale of taxation and the yield of the duties on the New York scale of taxation amounted to 1s. 3d. in the £, or nearly half of the revenue which the London County Council received last year by rates. He dared say he would be reminded by hon. Members opposite that while licence taxation in the United States was higher than it was here, the taxation of beer and spirits was lower; but when they made allowances to the full, he could prove, he believed, conclusively to the Committee that the liquor trade in this country was under-taxed to the extent of from £7,000,000 to £14,000,000 annually, and this sum must be lost to the community throughout the whole period of the time-limit. So that if they calculated the injustice to the community in pounds, shillings and pence, it did not rest with the licence-holder, but with the taxpayer of the country. That was one aspect of the question, but there was a more serious element in the price paid for the time-limit than that, and that was that it was inevitable that the efforts of the community must be fettered except in one direction, certainly as regarded all great and comprehensive measures of licensing reform. The community must wait, no matter how great might be its desire for freedom, until after the expiration of the time-limit.

The community being called upon to suffer this loss on the one hand, and being deprived of the power to exercise its resourceful energy for fourteen years, when hon. Members used the word "injustice" he said it should be used not on behalf of the licensing trade, but on behalf of the eager, over-ridden citizens and taxpayers.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said there was no man in the House more entitled to be heard on this subject than the hon. Member who had just sat down. He had followed his speech, however, with a great deal of attention, and he was bound to say that he hardly knew his exact position. He was evidently dissatisfied with the provisions of the Bill, and when he talked about the community paying compensation he thought his argument was rather far-fetched, because, however the community might pay, it was the individual who suffered. The hon. Member had also said something about some Amendment which he had put down to carry out his ideas, but they had not to consider what with his Amendment the Bill would be, but what the Bill did without his Amendment, because they knew that no Amendments that he would move would be of any use, because the Government were not likely to accept them. The hon. Member had said very rightly that compensation of some kind was the key of the difficulty. There was very little doubt about that. The hon. Member also said that statesmen should try to get some solution of that difficulty because it was the real problem; grant compensation, fair compensation, and everything else become plain and bereft of difficulty. But statesmen had not been consulted outside the Government, as they might have been, seeing that it was a question of national importance. It seemed to him that the United Kingdom Alliance had alone been consulted, and that the extreme teetotal party were the authors of this Bill. The hon. Member was also right when he said that the question of compensation was quite as urgent and prominent before the Act of 1904 as it had been since. The hon. Member seemed to lean in one part of his speech towards State compensation, and if hon. Members would accept that then they would show that their first object was temperance. But that was not their first object, which was to punish those connected with the liquor trade. After that they were willing to promote temperance. Why did they not take the example of such men as Wilberforce and his colleagues, who in regard to the slave trade put their cause first, and did not hesitate about compensation? They said that if they could not get rid of it without compensation, let there be compensation. They held that very lightly; but the position of the Temperance Party seemed to be that they loved temperance, but objected to pay for it. It had been said that there should be compensation by way of a time-limit or some equivalent compensation. But equivalent compensation was paying a fair price for the trade that had been allowed to grow up. If the State had made a mistake by the creation of this monopoly let the State pay for its mistake. That was the alternative. To himself the debate that night had been rather a sad one. He was an old Member of the House, and was very jealous of the morality of their legislation, and the nature of the legislation now before the Committee was calculated to make one sad. One thing he was pretty sure of—the debate that night had killed the Bill. He had no doubt it would pass that House, but it had killed the Bill in the eyes of the country, and it had laid an obligation upon another place to throw out the Bill—laid it upon them by the consideration of the rights of property and of public morality. A great deal had been said of the estimate of the monopoly value, but it did not matter what the value of the monopoly was, the moral question remained the same, and for that reason he was glad that none of his friends had attempted to extend or interfere with the time-limit. It did not matter whether the time-limit was fourteen or forty years—the immorality and the dishonesty remained the same. No exceptions were to be made in cases of those who had bought for value. He would take one instance which was typical of others, the purchaser of “The Coach and Horses.” What were they to say of a Government who sold licensed premises for £8,000 or £9,000, monopoly value as it was termed, knowing that they had at the same moment a Bill ready that would make them practically valueless? [Laughter.] Was it a laughing matter? He hoped the standard of morality had not fallen so low that they would laud in the Government an act which in a private individual would be scouted by all right-thinking people. And what about the pre-1869 licences? Where was the common honesty of including them in the general plunder? The monopolies possessed by railways, electric, gas, and water undertakings were the creation of Parliament just as were licences, and if the shareholders in them were treated as they proposed to treat the brewery shareholder, the monstrous injustice would become apparent. Nobody was safe. He saw in the Bill the beginning of a Socialistic movement which might be extended to any form of property. In fact, it was more Socialistic than the ideal of the Socialists with regard to the land as expressed by one of their most eminent leaders. They would take landed property it was true, but they would give the landlord a term of three lives, which generally extended over a long period. The Government only gave a term of years. The Prime Minister and many of his supporters had constantly referred to this as a brewers' Bill. But it was only a brewers' question in a minor degree. It is a question of a large section of the community. He had recently received a letter from a small tradesman which pointed out that this man had invested his savings in brewery shares, and relied on his investments for his old age. What right had the Government to take away from that man his investment? He was receiving 6 per cent. Suppose he had invested £100 and invested the £6 a year that he received from his shares at 3 or 3½ per cent. as a sinking fund. At the end of fourteen years he would just get back his £100. If his necessities compelled him to spend that £6 he would lose his capital at the end of fourteen years. In either case he was robbed. There were tens and hundreds of thousands of men and women who had invested their savings in brewery shares, and what right had the Government to take away their property? Hon. and right

hon. Gentlemen opposite might call it insurance. The result showed it to be simple robbery. If such a proposition were put before the country, there was not the shadow of a doubt what the answer of the country would be. In the people of England, whether in their sports, games or in their fights, there was a spirit of fairness. It was inherent in the national character, and if such a proposition was put before them as was illustrated by the instance to which he had referred they would not assent to it for a moment. If this Bill failed to become law, would the Government carry out their word? Would they submit it to the country? If they did the decisions of the recent by-elections would be found to be the simple foreshadowing of the verdict of the country. The United Kingdom Alliance was not in favour of temperance but of prohibition, and even if this Bill passed they would not be content. They would still go on for prohibition. Prohibition was their aim. He did not know a greater make-believe than the United Kingdom Alliance. They had said they were for prohibition, and had opposed every temperance reform from the time of Burke's measure so many years ago, down to the present Bill. They would not be content with this measure. They had been rightly described as the great bulwark of the liquor trade, because they had made all moderate reforms impossible. Sharpe v. Wakefield might be a legal decision, but to his mind there was a higher law even than Sharpe v. Wakefield—the Non-conformist element laughed at that higher law of morality. From the decision of Sharpe v. Wakefield up to the Bill of 1904, there were only thirty-two licences per annum suppressed on the ground that they were not wanted. That was the smallest possible fraction of the whole number; but because there was then an occasional possibility of suppressing single licences they were now confiscating all the licences of the country. That was the argument; but even the decision of Sharpe v. Wakefield was qualified by the words of Lord Bramwell and the Lord Chancellor. These qualifications, if read in connection with the decision, took away from it all the importance which hon. Members opposite attached to it. The clause had been made a question of religion. He saw that the hon. Member for the Skipton Division of Yorkshire said that those who believed in it were on the side of heaven and that those who did not were on the side of hell. These were his words. He did not believe he would dispute them.

AN HON. MEMBER: Not a bit of it.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked hon. Members to fancy the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone and the Leader of the Opposition going to hell because they opposed the Bill, and further to imagine the hon. Member for the Spen Valley and the hon. Member for Appleby in heaven—in some suburban villa there—petitioning for a gramophone so that they might listen to the cries and groans of the brewers and of the two hon. Members he had just named. It was too ludicrous. The hon. Member for the Skipton Division had two roles in the House, one was to prevent the labouring classes from getting a glass of beer, and the other was to prevent the labourer from having a bit of land to cultivate. That was how he had distinguished himself during the time he had honoured that Assembly with his presence. An hon. Member had asked a question about the reduction of licences under some form of compensation. Under the Act of 1904 in three years from 1st January 1905 to 1st January, 1908, there were nearly 4,000 licences extinguished, and the progress of extinction was progressive because in 1907 there were nearly 1,800 extinguished. If that had continued for fourteen years, they would have had about 20,000 licences extinguished. Did the hon. Member call that a small reduction?

MR. SHERWELL: The hon. Gentleman is under some misapprehension. I never referred to the matter.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS said the hon. Gentleman spoke of some compensation by which licences might be reduced, and here was a means that did not need a farthing of public money. This reduction had gone on, and the licences suppressed were the very kind they wanted to see extinguished. The judgment of the magistrates had enabled them to weed out those which were not satisfactory, and if the process were continued for fourteen years, they would have nearly 20,000 carefully selected licences suppressed. The Prime Minister said that that was not adequate. He wanted 30,000. But those 30,000 were to be done away with without any discrimination whatever. The 1904 Act, therefore, had been an excellent Act for the suppression of licences. He was amused by the temperance societies. Some years ago the Member for West Birmingham and himself went to Gothenburg to examine the system there, and on their return, the Member for West Birmingham introduced a measure to enable communities to buy licences. Who opposed it? Those represented by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Their favourite phrase was: "We won't touch the accursed thing." But now, when they could get the licences for nothing, they were quite willing to touch the accursed thing, in fact, they were eager to do it. There was one other point. The question had been argued from the point of view of the brewery companies, but hon. Members knew there were scattered up and down the country hundreds and thousands of public-houses which butlers, and other mer-servants had taken. It was a small thing, but there were thousands of them. What right had they to go and rob them? They told them they were first going to put a tax upon them to extinguish their neighbours and then at the end of fourteen years they were going to extinguish them too. Would anyone get up and defend that sort of thing? There had been no defence. He quite recognised that Members liked to be loyal to party feeling, but when it became a question of honesty, surely there ought to be a number on the other side of the House who would refuse to be party to such a nefarious scheme as was contained in the Bill, or else give them some reason why they were a party to it. In some religious communities they had what was called a satisfying minister. When the old minister did not please them he was replaced by this satisfying minister. After a few weeks of him, they prayed Heaven to get the old one back.

The present was the satisfying Government and the country was saying that it was tired of it and wished to have the old one back.

*MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside) said he had no desire to follow the right hon. Gentleman in his somewhat delicate theological speculations, but he would like to say that, if hon. Gentlemen opposite took up the position of resenting some of the invective proceeding from that side of the House, then they should modify their own language. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had spoken of the Bill as a measure of robbery. He did not know what the theology of the right hon. Gentleman was or where he expected, in his theology, robbers to go, but he would suggest that, after using such expressions, they could only reasonably expect countervailing invective from the supporters of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman first denounced the statement of an hon. Member on that side of the House that the supporters of the Bill were for the cause of good, and those who opposed it were for the cause of evil, and then he proceeded to apply the word "robbery" to the Bill. ["Hear, hear."] Did hon. Members opposite claim a monopoly of malediction as well as other monopolies? In spite of the number of interesting and able speeches in this debate there were some important matters raised in the discussion on the theory of property on which he proposed to offer a few comments. The right hon. Gentleman had drawn an analogy between the case of a railway and a public-house. He said the railway was a monopoly, and he asked if they claimed they could take it away after a certain number of years as they proposed to do in the case of the public-house. Supposing the State did, as he had no doubt it would ere long, take over the railways, it would, he presumed, do it on a valuation of their plant and stock; and, if any railway should be in the position of being able to present a claim for a monopoly value over and above that, it would be the particular duty of the State to give facilities for the creating of another railway for the destruction of that monopoly value. The two things were absolutely contrary is character, and no such claim would ever be set up in the case of the railways. The right hon. Gentleman was particularly indignant over the case of the "Coach and Horses." He seemed to have given to the purchaser a quantity of sympathy the purchaser had not at all desired.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: He is sure this Bill will not pass.

*Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON asked how in that case the right hon. Gentleman could condemn the Government. The real issue in the matter was this: The Government claimed that the limit they allowed was a limit which made any purchase of a licence at recent values still capable of being reasonably liquidated within the time-limit, and, if the purchaser paid a price that could not be balanced by fourteen years use, then he was a party to a general form of error which the Government could not be supposed to detect. He bought at the market value, and the market value was the basis of the time-limit proposed. Another hon. Gentleman opposite actually compared public-house licences with motor-car licences. They were told that if they took away public-house licences, they could equally take away motor-car licences after fourteen years. Was it suggested that motor-cars were limited by the issue of licences in the public interest? Some quotations had been made from speeches by Mr. Gladstone on the question of compensation. It happened that Mr. Gladstone, in his youth, was at one time ill-advised enough to accept the argument then current among Protectionists to the effect that the duty upon corn represented a contract between the State and the landed interest, and that the State having kept the tax on for a number of years had practically entered into a bargain with the landed interest that the tax would be continued and, therefore, that the State was bound to respect that bargain. In later years, however, he was sure Mr. Gladstone would see that that position was indefensible; but hon. Members opposite with their extraordinary notions of analogies would have no difficulty whatever in carrying the argument of analogy to this extent. If they ever got a tariff they would have created, by their own argument, a vested interest which the State would not have the right to take away. The phrase "vested right" had been used again and again. One speaker had spoken of a certainty, although it was elicited in the course of the debate that the Licences Insurance Corporation actually spoke of the precariousness of the whole matter and admitted that there was nothing in the nature of certainty, and that licences were likely to be taken away as not required. There had been some mystification which he proposed to clear up. The hon. Member for South Hackney undertook to convict the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley of contradiction. But supposing the right hon. Gentleman had written the passages that had been quoted, they were perfectly consistent with the argument of the right hon. Gentleman on the Second Reading of the Bill, when he contended that despite temperance legislation a large number of breweries were still good investments. That was a view which would be endorsed by any City man to-day.

Mr. BOTTOMLEY: My point was that he said all brewery investments were good investments.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER: Perhaps I may be allowed to interpose for a moment. I had hoped that when the hon. Gentleman was speaking I made it clear to the House not only that I did not write any of the passages which he quoted, but that I had no control over them and no responsibility for them. I do not wonder at the misapprehension of the hon. Gentleman; but it is not necessary for me to explain my own private relations in the matter beyond saying that my connection was not one which involved any control over or any responsibility whatever for those portions which the hon. Gentleman read.

*Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON thought that that disposed of the personal aspect of the matter. The hon. Member for South Hackney now professed to have quoted a passage, which represented that some writer or other, not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spens Valley, as having said that all breweries were sound investments. Not one of the passages he read could bear such a meaning. Hon. Members opposite were particularly gratified by the hon. Gentleman's argument in regard to the effect produced upon the drink trade by the famous decision which, according to some speakers, made a great trade newly secure, and to others newly insecure. The hon. Member began by telling them that the corporation for insuring licences was started originally because of the disquietude created by the Sharpe v. Wakefield decision. A little later on in his argument he triumphantly pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman, like all other sane men, just after that decision, realised that there was no ground for disquietude. These two perfectly contradictory arguments were welcomed opposite. The hon. Member went on to say that the corporation did very little business, the argument being that it was found that either there was nothing to insure or the publicans had become newly satisfied that they were secure and not insecure as they had supposed. They had the actual figures showing the business done by the Licences Insurance Corporation. It began in 1893 and it stated then that it had insured £3,000,000 worth of licences; in 1897 it claimed to have insured £12,000,000 worth; in 1898, £25,000,000 worth; in 1899, £30,000,000 worth; in 1900, £40,000,000; 1901, £50,000,000; and in 1903, £60,000,000 worth. They had heard of politicians who thought in continents, and there were financiers who thought in billions. It was a ground on which he did not feel at home.

MR. BOTTOMLEY: Has my hon. friend ever heard of a stage army?

*MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I have no doubt my hon. friend knows a great deal more about stage armies of that description than I do. It was from the hon. Gentleman that the suggestion came that this corporation, insuring in one year £60,000,000 worth of licences, and compensating in one year 399 houses insured for £396,000, was a stage army. He (Mr. Robertson) really did not understand these high matters of finance, and the insinuations made concerning this corporation came from the hon. Member and not from him; but he preferred to regard those figures, coming from a corporation associated with such an honourable trade as the drink trade, as standing for honest finance and honest business. He thought such figures, drawn from public financial records, were better evidence than even the personal authority of so distinguished a financier as the hon. Gentleman. One or two words more on the aspect of the political theory of property. It was quite true that there were forms of property which were not freehold, and still were secure forms of property so far as they went; and it might be interesting to consider some of these forms of property as throwing some light on the ethics of political life. Let them take the case of patents. An inventor made an invention, for which the State gave him protection for a certain number of years only, after which the invention, which was the fruit of his brain, should be free to be copied by any man. Observe how they dealt here with the right in the invention, which might be a very great boon to mankind, and strictly limited it. Supposing that the patentee said this was robbery, and asked for a perpetuity of control, would hon. Members opposite give it him? Let them take the case of copyright. An author and his heirs had a copyright in his book for a number of years, and then the State abolished the monopoly profit from the sale. Was there any robbery there, or would hon. Members opposite ever propose greatly to lengthen the period of copyright? In the case of a man holding a farm and paying a certain rent, did hon. Members opposite recognise on his part any claim grounded upon a reasonable expectation of continuity? Reasonable expectation must be discussed on the basis of the commonsense of the nation at large. The commonsense of the nation at large was not to be found in the public-house. He was no temperance fanatic, but he was making a statement, the commonsense of which was known to the more thoughtful of hon. Members opposite. The reasonable expectation of which they had heard was simply the expectation of commercial egoism raised to the very highest pitch. That could never be a basis for legislation for a democratic community. What was the example of other communities of the Anglo-Saxon race? Everyone of them would regard the House of Commons in dealing with the drink trade as quixotic in its generosity. All the protectionist Colonies and the United States, to which Members were so apt to point as the great models in the higher political science, would never dream of according to it half the concessions which were being offered in this Bill. On these grounds he supported the clause.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said the hon. Member for Tyneside opened his animated and interesting speech by promising the Committee that he was going to advance some new arguments in favour of the position challenged by the Opposition. He created a legitimate expectation, but he had disappointed the Committee, because his speech travelled precisely upon the same lines as the speeches of hon. Members who had preceded him, notably that of the hon. Member for Huddersfield. His speech was made in order to prove that it was just to take away the property which had accrued in licences under existing circumstances, and in conjunction with the new circumstances which this Bill introduced. It was contended not only that this would be just, but also that it would be a very lucrative thing for the State. That practically had been the burden of the speeches made by hon. Members opposite. It was strange that though they were going to be asked to decide upon the crucial question of the Bill, not one speech from the Government side had yet discussed it. The last speaker had not attempted to justify the imposition of a time-limit in existing circumstances, still less in conjunction with the other proposals of the Bill. They did not believe true that those who had an interest in the licensed trade were not paying a proper contribution to the of the State. If it were true, let them impose higher licences, though they held that that would be unjust. But the time-limit under existing circumstances, and in conjunction with other provisions in the Bill, would inflict an injustice, would destroy the good they sought, and would do nothing in the cause of morality. The Prime Minister had asked them to say whether they were opposed to any time-limit of any length. That was not the question which the Committee had to decide. They had to discuss whether it was just to impose this fourteen years time-limit in view of the historical facts which led up to the Act of 1904, and of the other provisions of this Bill. They thought it was not just, and even if there was a new untapped source of revenue to be discovered by those pioneers of finance, they would not touch it, because they would be making themselves parties in an act of injustice. The Prime Minister said it was just, because there were two elements in the property which he proposed to tax: (1) The expectation that the licences would be renewed, and (2) the expectation that the licensees would not be subjected to unlimited competition. But there was a third element in this property—the good-will which the licence-holder created by his business capacity. It all depended upon that third element, without which the other two had no value at all. So far as the expectation of continuity was concerned, they were not giving a boon to these men by giving them that expectation, but were merely providing them with what was provided to all others in all other trades by the State. If they destroyed this expectation, they destroyed the value which the man had added by his own business capacity, and in destroying that value they destroyed

Minister had dwelt on the second element, that the competition was not unlimited; but if they destroyed the expectation of continuity, they reduced the value of the second element, whatever it might be, to the point of insignificance, and if they carried the other provisions proposed they would extinguish it altogether. The fact was that they could not make this metaphysical trisection of the problem. Property in licences existed in the fact that it was going to be enjoyed in the future as at present, in the business capacity of the holders of licences, and in a minor degree in the fact that they were not exposed to cut-throat competition. If all those three elements hung together then he thought he had proved the second question he had put as to whether what was now proposed was just. He contended that it was not just. As to whether they were going to secure abounding revenue for the State, he believed that the amount of booty would be infinitesimal. When that had been urged in the country, it had been thought sufficiently ingenious to reply: "How inconsistent it is to say that we are going to rob a number of honest investors and, on the other hand, that we are not going to transfer any new and abounding revenues to the Exchequer." There was no inconsistency. They were going to destroy property and not appropriate it, and to those who owned it there was no difference if the Committee was invited to act in the capacity of savages or of brigands.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: What is robbery?

MR. WYNDHAM did not know that an act ceased to be an act of robbery when the property to be conveyed had been deprived of all its value. The third question was far more important than the second: Would this promote the morality of the country, supposing it were just and lucrative? If they had any time-limit, whether of fourteen or forty years, they were deliberately casting a shadow of opprobrium on the whole of this trade. Then they were surprised if they were able to describe it, as they wished to do, as shady—they made it as disreputable as they could. In the interest of the morality of the country they ought to seek to make the public-houses places of social recreation and honest enjoyment, and he defied any man to do that who voted for a time-limit. They could not expect that public-houses would be better regulated if they placed them under a ban of censure in this way. If the annual licence was to be really an annual licence then they made it absolutely necessary that the licence-holder should make as much money as he could out of it in that period. Public-houses in this country were not drinking shops. [Cries of "Oh."] Some of them were, but that was because they had proceeded in the past with too little regard for the best feelings of those men who conducted them. The public-houses were the only places where large numbers of the people could meet and exchange their words of wisdom, and Parliament had no right to make these places of social intercourse a form of shame to those who frequented them. Hon. Members had their comfortable homes and their clubs. If they had no such opportunities of meeting their fellow-men in reasonable circumstances of amenity and goodwill, they would become strangers and outcasts of their race. That was not a quotation but an application of the words of a man long since dead, the Lord Chancellor, Sir Thomas More, who laid it down that unless he found time at his meals to meet his family and his friends he would become a stranger in his own house. If Parliament denied to the working classes the only equivalent open to many of them to such opportunities as were open to those better off, they would make them not only strangers in their own houses but strangers in the land of their birth.

*MR. J. M. HENDERSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he did not rise to discuss the question of the time-limit. He understood the Leader of the Opposition had admitted the principle of it. He understood that the only point which the right hon. Gentleman made was that at the end of the time-limit it was proposed to take the monopoly value while in the interim the licence-holders would be contributing to the compensation fund. There was something in that view if compensation was to be paid on the principle on which it had hitherto been paid, but he submitted to the Committee that they would have to settle some reasonable and proper method of compensation other than the present system. Hitherto under the Kennedy judgment compensation had been computed on a vicious principle. He would give to the Committee a few figures which had come under his own notice, and which he thought ought to be brought to their notice when they were considering this question. Compensation was frightening hon. Members on the opposite side of the House—the compensation which would have to be paid during fourteen years, and the monopoly value which would have to be paid at the end of the fourteen years. The point he wished to make was this, that the licensing magistrates throughout the country had hitherto been putting an exaggerated construction on compensation and an equally exaggerated estimate on the monopoly value. How did they arrive at the compensation under the present system? He would tell the Committee a personal experience. A client of his lent a publican £500. The house was in the City of London, and absolutely untied. The publican could not pay the interest or principal, and the result was that a receiver was put in possession. The receiver tried to sell the house, and he had not been there a month until he told the lender that he was losing money every day. The house was offered to brewer after brewer, and it was put up to auction, but a purchaser could not be found, and before long the debt on the place had jumped from £500 to £1,100. Would it be believed that that man got £1,000 compensation for the business, though it had been losing money every day? He could not believe that the Leader of the Opposition ever meant that anything of the kind should take place under the Act of 1904. The Kennedy judgement said that they had to give a man the "market value." When people talked of "market value" they talked very much in the air. There were certain things for which there was a market value, such as railway stocks, grain, iron, steel, and many other things in which there was buying and selling every day, but there were many things in which there was absolutely no market value. To use the term "market value" was to use a misnomer. The only market value was what a place would fetch at an auction. The house referred to was put up to auction and it was offered all round, and there was not a single bidder. [AN HON. MEMBER: Was there a reserve price on it?] There was no reserve price. What happened? The man's solicitor manoeuvred to leave the house scheduled for compensation. He

which had been made for new licences from 1904; when he saw traders having to pay £5,000 down for a new licence, he said that that would cause the expectation of renewal which would constitute a practical embarrassment a few years hence, and he wanted to guard against the recurrence of the compensation difficulty. There was one criticism he would like to make in connection with the present proposal. Whilst he understood quite clearly the end towards which it proceeded, he doubted very much whether the present time-limit proposal would secure the end aimed at unless subsequently there was associated with it some new condition covering the tenure of licences, which would prevent the compensation difficulty or the expectation of renewal. For his own part, he did not think that anything except the institution of some form of public tender, such as proposed by Mr. Bruce, would guarantee the community against the recurrence at some future time of this compensation difficulty. But before he sat down there was one aspect of this question which had not been touched on, but to which he thought it was very desirable to allude. They heard a great deal concerning the injustice of this time-limit proposal. The injustice of it had always been construed to be in the treatment of the licensed trader, but he would like to ask hon. Members opposite whether there was not involved in this time-limit proposal a very distinct and definite injustice to the community at large. What was the price which the community was called upon to pay for this time-limit concession to "the trade"? He did not know whether it had been quite realised by hon. Members on the opposite side the financial price which the country had to pay for this concession of the time-limit. It was obvious that during the whole currency of the time-limit, i.e., for the whole period of fourteen years, there could be no adjustment of licence taxation to the real value of the licence. That was to say, that for the whole period of the time-limit the community must forego any increased taxation on licences. When he remembered the amount which was due from the licensed trade, he realised the amount which the community had to pay for this time-limit. Contrasting this taxation with the taxation of the same trade in other countries, which represented conditions which in all essentials were identical with the conditions encountered here, he began to understand the real price that the country would have to pay for this generous concession to the licensed trade. He did not want to weary the Committee with figures, but he would give them one or two. Take the whole of the towns in the United Kingdom, with a population exceeding 30,000 persons—the average payment by the publican for a licence was £27 a year. Take towns in the United States of America of the same size, and the average payment made by the publican was £147 a year. Let him give another case. London to-day received from its liquor licences £275,000 a year, but if London received for them in proportion to population, the sum received from the publicans of New York she would receive just over £3,000,000 annually. The difference between the yield of the duties on our existing scale of taxation and the yield of the duties on the New York scale of taxation amounted to 1s. 3d. in the £, or nearly half of the revenue which the London County Council received last year by rates. He dared say he would be reminded by hon. Members opposite that while licence taxation in the United States was higher than it was here, the taxation of beer and spirits was lower; but when they made allowances to the full, he could prove, he believed, conclusively to the Committee that the liquor trade in this country was under-taxed to the extent of from £7,000,000 to £14,000,000 annually, and this sum must be lost to the community throughout the whole period of the time-limit. So that if they calculated the injustice to the community in pounds, shillings and pence, it did not rest with the licence-holder, but with the taxpayer of the country. That was one aspect of the question, but there was a more serious element in the price paid for the time-limit than that, and that was that it was inevitable that the efforts of the community must be fettered except in one direction, certainly as regarded all great and comprehensive measures of licensing reform. The community must wait, no matter how great might be its desire for freedom, until after the expiration of the time-limit.

The community being called upon to suffer this loss on the one hand, and being deprived of the power to exercise its resourceful energy for fourteen years, when hon. Members used the word "injustice" he said it should be used not on behalf of the licensing trade, but on behalf of the eager, over-ridden citizens and taxpayers.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said there was no man in the House more entitled to be heard on this subject than the hon. Member who had just sat down. He had followed his speech, however, with a great deal of attention, and he was bound to say that he hardly knew his exact position. He was evidently dissatisfied with the provisions of the Bill, and when he talked about the community paying compensation he thought his argument was rather far-fetched, because, however the community might pay, it was the individual who suffered. The hon. Member had also said something about some Amendment which he had put down to carry out his ideas, but they had not to consider what with his Amendment the Bill would be, but what the Bill did without his Amendment, because they knew that no Amendments that he would move would be of any use, because the Government were not likely to accept them. The hon. Member had said very rightly that compensation of some kind was the key of the difficulty. There was very little doubt about that. The hon. Member also said that statesmen should try to get some solution of that difficulty because it was the real problem; grant compensation, fair compensation, and everything else become plain and bereft of difficulty. But statesmen had not been consulted outside the Government, as they might have been, seeing that it was a question of national importance. It seemed to him that the United Kingdom Alliance had alone been consulted, and that the extreme teetotal party were the authors of this Bill. The hon. Member was also right when he said that the question of compensation was quite as urgent and prominent before the Act of 1904 as it had been since. The hon. Member seemed to lean in one part of his speech towards State compensation, and if hon. Members would accept that then they but if they were to make up their accounts to-day, and if, whatever price they paid for their houses, they would take a ten years' purchase of the profit that the business of the public-house was yielding, they could, in fifteen years, paying 5 per cent. all the time, replace the whole of the capital at 4 per cent. The hon. Member for Ramsgate had referred to a brewery which was earning £12,600. But what was the capital of that brewery? He was amazed to hear it said that the capital was £700,000. The real value of that business was £250,000. When dealing with brewery finance it was no use telling the House that the capital was so much. What they wanted to know was how much was the profit and fair capital attributable to the ownership of licensed houses. He thought he had said enough to show that it was no use introducing general brewery finance into this question. He had no feeling against brewers, Heaven knew. He had held brewery shares himself, but they had gone. He thought that to adopt the deeply hostile attitude against the Bill which hon. Gentlemen opposite were taking up was a very great mistake.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) rose to continue the debate when,

MR. ASQUITH moved that the Question be now put. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Gag."]

*THE CHAIRMAN did not accept the closure stating that he thought the Committee would soon be ready to come to a decision.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY said that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made a very interesting speech. The latter part of it was devoted to showing the enormous profits which some public-houses made, and that, therefore, they could put aside reserve capital, while in the earlier part of his speech the hon. Member said that the licence-holders could not make any profit at all. They had all heard of the bloated profits which the brewers made in public-houses and a good deal in the course of the debate about the monopoly value, but he submitted to the Committee that, in those cases where public-houses did not pay because, as the hon. Member opposite had just said, there was too keen competition, there was, as a matter of fact, no monopoly value at all, and that, therefore, there was nothing which the owners of those houses owed to the State or which could be taken from them by the State. He did not wish to stand further between the Committee and the division.

Question put, "That the words after the word 'the' stand part of the clause."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

Progress was reported.

House resumed, Mr. SPEAKER, in the Chair.

And, it being after Eleven of the Clock, the CHAIRMAN left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order of the House of 31st July, adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at twelve minutes after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 16th October, 1908.

The House met at Twelve noon of the Clock.

Copy presented, of Old-Age Pensions Regulations, 1908. Dated 20th August, 1908 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 303.]

BANKRUPTCY (RULES).

Copy presented, of General Rule, dated 20th August, 1908, in substitution for Rule 103 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, in pursuance of Section 127 of The Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

SHOP HOURS ACT, 1904.

Copy presented, of Order made by the Council of the County Borough of Salford, and confirmed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, fixing the Hours of Closing for certain classes of Shops within the county borough [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS
CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

The British South Africa Company and the Transvaal Government.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if the British South Africa Chartered Company are in negotiation with the Transvaal Government with the view of the latter buying the rights of the British South Africa Chartered Company; and, if so, is it with the sanction of His Majesty's Government.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) No, Sir; I am not aware of any such negotiation.

Crown Agents for the Colonies.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Committee appointed to inquire into the constitution, management, etc., of the Office of the Crown Agents for the Colonies has yet made any Report; and, if so, whether he has any objection to state the purport of the same and what action, if any, has been taken thereon.

The sport.

Postal Pay at Oswestry and Newtown.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Postmaster-General why Oswestry with units of work and cost of living 120 and ninety-six, respectively, is given a 44s. scale of pay for clerks while Newtown, with corresponding figures of 120 and ninety-three, is only given 40s.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The volume of work at Oswestry and at Newtown is the minimum for offices in Class IV. Oswestry, where the cost of living index number is ninety-six compared with a normal 100, falls naturally into Class IV.; but the index number of the cost of living at Newtown, which is only ninety-three, is not sufficiently high to remove it from Class V.

Employment of Temporary Clerks in Belfast Post Office.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Postmaster-General if he can say under what circumstance it has been considered necessary to employ six temporary sorting clerks in Belfast post office since 1907; if the necessity for employing these officers justifies an increase of staff; and, if so, if steps will be taken to do so.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The employment of temporary sorting clerks and telegraphists was sanctioned as the best alternative to overtime pending definite provision for the duties concerned. Authority has already been given for replacing them by established officers.

Old-Age Pensions Regulations.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the signature of the Statutory Old-Age Pensions regulations which caused the delay in laying upon the Table of the House the regulations dated 20th August, and stated to have been signed and given under seal on the 20th August, and explained in the Local Government Board circular dated the 21st August; whether the document as signed on the 15th October is to be substituted for that previously issued; and whether it differs from it; and, if so, in what respects.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am advised that the requirement of Section 10 (3) of the Old-Age Pensions Act applies only to substantive regulations, and does not apply to draft regulations, such as those signed on the 20th August last, even though they are, as these were, brought into operation forthwith as provisional regulations under the provisions of the Rules Publication Act, 1893. The substantive regulations under the Act were signed on behalf of the Treasury, and I believe also on behalf of the other departments concerned, yesterday, in accordance with the draft, subject to a few small Amendments, for particulars of which I may perhaps refer my right hon. friend to the regulations themselves, which will be circulated early next week.

The Kathiawar Succession.

MR. REES: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can now give the House any information regarding the disposal of the memorial from the Chief of Jasdan regarding the law of succession in Kathiawar.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) No memorial from the Chief of Jasdan has recently been before the Secretary of State in Council on the subject mentioned. It has, however, been decided on the memorials from several Kathi Chiefs and others, concerning which my hon. friend asked a Question on the 31st July last, that cases of succession to Kathi estates must be dealt with as they occur on their merits.

Madras Landed Estates.

MR. REES: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the memorial of the Madras Landholders Association against the Madras Landed Estates Bill is still under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The memorial in Question, dated the 6th May 1908, has received the careful attention of the Secretary of State in connection with the Act to which it referred. After full consideration he decided to leave the Act, to which the Viceroy had already assented, to its operation. But insomuch as it deals with complicated and difficult questions, the Secretary of State has directed that its working should be carefully watched. Any amendments of its provisions which experience may show to be needed will doubtless be made the subject of legislation with no unnecessary delay.

Irish Proclaimed Counties.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what are the counties in Ireland which, since August 1907, have been declared by proclamations of the Lord-Lieutenant and Privy Council to be in a state of disturbance necessitating the employment of additional police; what was the date of each such proclamation; what is the total number of police at present serving in each county, distinguishing between ordinary and extra establishments; and in what districts of counties unproclaimed are additional police employed, and to what extent.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The information asked for is given in the following tables:—

Proclaimed Counties.

Counties.	Dates of Proclamations.	Actual Strength of Police Forces now serving.
		Free Force.	Extra Forces.
			Appointed in pursuance of Proclamation.	Reserve.
Clare - - -	27th August, 1907	356	107	52

Cattle-driving in Ireland.

MR. LONSDALE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will consent to the Return of which notice appears on the Paper for Monday relative to the number of cattle-drives in Ireland since 1st January, 1907.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Answer is in the affirmative.

Training of Irish School Teachers.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the senior inspector at Derry has the authority of the Commissioner of National Education for pressing teachers in the Ballymoney district who have received a course of training in elementary science to attend another course now, and if authority has been given to demand from teachers their reasons for refusing to attend a second course; and what steps, if any, will be taken to protect teachers from such interference with their personal freedom.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The courses in question are held by local technical committees under the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for the training of national school teachers in elementary science. The Commissioners of National Education inform me that their inspectors recommend the teachers for whom such courses are desirable or necessary and who are willing to attend. So far as the Commissioners are aware no pressure is exercised by the inspectors to secure the attendance of teachers. The teachers who are recommended by inspectors are furnished with forms on which they may make application for admission to the courses. Teachers who have already attended a course are debarred from attending a second similar course except at their own expense.

Agrarian Crime in Ireland.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of persons tried before juries in respect of agrarian crime and cattle-driving in each of the two years ended 30th September, 1908, and the result of the trial in such cases.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The required particulars are as follows:—

	Number of persons tried.	Number convicted	Number acquitted.	Number in whose cases the jury disagreed and the prosecution was dropped.	Number in whose cases the jury disagreed and new trials have not yet taken place.	Number of cases withdrawn.
Agrarian Crime:
Year ended 30th September, 1907 -	65	14	42	8	Nil	1
Year ended 30th September, 1908 -	85	21	54	Nil	10	Nil
Cattle-driving:
Year ended 30th September, 1907 -	12	Nil	12	Nil	Nil	Nil
Year ended 30th September, 1908 -	124	5	18	50	51	Nil

Failure to serve Writs in Ireland.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many cases have occurred during the current year of process servers being unable to serve writs owing to the disturbed condition of the district.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) During the period in question seven such cases came to the knowledge of the police, and four other cases were reported which the police regard as doubtful. The police authorities have no information as to the number of cases in which writs may have been sent by post owing to the belief of the process servers that formal service could not be effected.

Camp Pay to Territorial Soldiers.

MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): To ask the Secretary of State for War on what date the pay and allowances due to members of the Territorial Force for attendance in camp this year were paid over by the War Office; whether he is aware that no payment in respect of such attendance in camp has yet been paid to the Territorials entitled to it; and, will he make some regulation requiring prompt payment in such cases (Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The regulations provide for the issue of cash to the adjutant of each Territorial unit before proceeding to camp. He issues to officers commanding companies the sums required by them for the pay and allowances of the non-commissioned officers and men during the training. All the men, therefore, should have been paid at camp. Perhaps the hon. Member will give me some specific instance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington): May I ask the Prime Minister if he can tell us the arrangements for business next week?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. Asquith, Fife, E.) said they proposed on Monday to take first the conclusion of the Report stage of the Children Bill and the Third Reading, next the Prevention of Crime Bill to be ordered for Third Reading, at 8.15 the instruction on the Second Reading of the London Electric Supply Bill, and afterwards White Phosphorus Matches Prohibition Bill. Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday would be the sixth to the ninth allotted days for the Committee stage of the Licensing Bill.

and Friday would be the sixth to the ninth allotted days for the Committee stage of the Licensing Bill.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3:

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) moved an Amendment to insert after the first "the" in the first line of subsection (1) the words "expiration of the lease of any licensed premises granted prior to the 5th day of April, 1908, or if there be no such lease, after the." The object of the Amendment, he said, was to mitigate a great injustice which the provisions of the Bill would undoubtedly inflict on the leasehold occupier of licensed premises in some cases, and of the reversionary owner of premises let on lease in other cases. What would be the position of the leasehold occupier of licensed premises under the Bill, assuming that he was not compensated during the fourteen years reduction period? During all that time he would pay the levy, in the first instance. Then at the end of that time he stood to have the whole of his interest taken away from him summarily without compensation, and at the same time he remained burdened with conditions of sale which might very possibly include payment for repairs, and also in many cases he was still saddled with the interest of the money which he had borrowed in order to acquire that interest. He could give as one example a lease granted in 1907 by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for eighty years at £200 per annum rent. In addition they exacted a premium of £3,000, and they made the lessees spend £6,000 on the premises and promise to spend £1,500 more in 1918. All this burden, imposed by a Department of the Government, would remain on the unfortunate lessee, and unless he had what he supposed, on the whole, would be the good luck to be for the whole term of seventy-nine years. There was another instance, in which he could not give the names, but they were all vouched for by the Central Board of the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Association of London, and he did not doubt that that body would, if challenged, at any rate, give the names in private. They vouched for examples like this—un-expired term of lease thirty-two years, licensed victualler's own money invested £16,000, of which £6,500 remained as a private loan. There were plenty of other cases—twenty-eight years un-expired, private loan £21,000, on which interest had to be paid; seventy years, private loan £20,000; fifty-two years, private loan £2,500. Much heavy and irreparable damage would fall upon the leaseholder, and in many cases upon the mortgagee as well. Another position was where a short time had to run, and in that case it was not so much the leaseholder who might suffer as the reversionary owner. In the case of a short term the reversionary owner would stand to have the full value of the licence, which in many cases, of course, was infinitely greater than the freehold, taken away from him. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley and others would say that these persons ought to have known the risks they were running. Ought they to have known? Certainly not before the time of Sharpe v. Wakefield. Ought they since? He contended that they certainly could not know the risk they were running of anything like the procedure which the present Bill contemplated. No doubt after the judgment in Sharpe v. Wakefield there was considerable alarm among all connected with licensed property. But as the limitations of that judgment became better understood it became clear that many of the original forebodings were very greatly exaggerated. For example, in the years between Sharpe v. Wakefield and the 1904 Act the average reductions of full licences, at any rate for redundancies, were only thirty-two a year, which worked out at a proportion of about 1 in 2,000 every year. If that was the risk, very light insurance premiums would have enabled all those interested to have fully covered their risks. He did not know what premiums the corporation they had heard so much about yesterday demanded, but he was certain they could not possibly in the face of the present Bill renew their policies at anything like the premium when the risk was only 1 in 2,000 a year. Again, the expectation of the reversionary owner of licensed property was distinctly held to be good by two decisions in Courts of law. In the first instance, there was the case of Bolton v. London County Council in 1893, where the County Council tried to establish that the licence was granted nominally for one year only, and that there was no lasting value arising from the possession of the licence. The Divisional Court, Justices Day and Collins, entirely disregarded and put that aside, and said the market value of the property must be taken into consideration, and the decision of the arbitrator, admitting the reversionary value arising from the licence, was upheld. In another case, Cocks v. Lady Henry Somerset, in 1895 it was decided that Lady Henry Somerset, having a life interest in some licensed property, was not entitled to close the house and dispose of the licence, because of the ultimate reversionary benefit. Those who entered into those contracts, whether they were the leaseholders or the owners having a reversionary interest in future, or whether it was the case of a man having a reversionary interest in licensed property, were fully entitled to the expectation that the right which they bought would be guaranteed by the State, and if that was so before the 1904 Act their title was infinitely stronger since. Therefore, great as was the injustice to every class, the position of those whose interests were involved, where there was a question of a lease of licensed property, was very much greater, and it was that injustice which he asked the House to obviate. He was quite certain that in no other description of property would at any rate the majority of hon. Members opposite adopt or defend the same procedure which they applied to licensed property. He knew before this controversy arose that he held different religious beliefs from those of the majority of the House, but till this controversy arose he never knew how vast was the difference of his religious belief from that held by the great majority opposite, because he was convinced that, with the exception of the hon. Member for South Hackney and one or two other chosen spirits, they were all guilty of the Manichæan heresy, which held that certain forms of matter were essentially evil in themselves and not merely in their effects, and that must be the belief of hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to alcohol. They must look on it as something essentially vicious, and on anyone having to do with alcohol or making any profit by it as tainted by some special vice which disentitled him to the ordinary consideration that all other of His Majesty's subjects enjoyed. Only on this theory could he explain their attitude, and it was to obviate the worst injustice which this attitude produced that he moved this Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 9, after the first word 'the,' to insert the words 'expiration of the lease of any licensed premises granted prior to the fifth day of April, nineteen hundred and eight, or, if there be no such lease, after the.'"—(Mr. James Hope.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) said the Amendment as it stood would in the first place make nonsense of the clause. From the drafting point of view it was quite impossible and would have an effect entirely different from that which the hon. Member had mentioned.

MR. JAMES HOPE said that if the hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment he would undertake to regulate the drafting.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the Committee was entitled to ask that when an Amendment on so serious matter as this was put down the ordinary consequential Amendments should be put down also. The effect of Amendment if accepted, unless modified, would be that the whole Clause 3 would not operate until the termination of the longest now-existing for any house. The monopoly value would not be taken until the longest lease had come to an end. Secondly, if it was modified in that particular it might have the opposite effect with regard to other existing leases which ran out, say, next year, and it would bring the monopoly value clause into operation as respected these houses immediately and would give them no time-limit. As soon as the lease came to an end the monopoly value would be taken. He failed to see why they should make this discrimination between the house which was held on a lease and a house which was held freehold. There were perhaps in a given neighbourhood two houses, one belonging to one brewery company and the other to another. The first had been bought freehold and was the absolute possession of the company, and in the case of the second a long lease had been purchased perhaps for a lump sum. In the case of the first house, if the principle of the Amendment was accepted, the monopoly value would be taken as soon as the time-limit came to an end. In the case of the second, no monopoly value would be taken until the end of the lease, perhaps seventy or eighty years hence. Obviously the company which held the freehold house would be put in a most unfair position in contrast with the company which held the leasehold house. They would be paying year by year the monopoly value, the trade would be undoubtedly handicapped in competition with the other house, and he failed to see from the point of view of the liquor trade itself how a discrimination of this kind could be defended. The hon. Member said the leaseholder at the termination of the time-limit when he began to have to pay the monopoly value had a continuing obligation. He had to continue—in spite of the time-limit and the monopoly value charge—to pay the rent which he undertook to pay before this this point was concerned. Therefore, there was no reason whatever to discriminate between the leaseholder as such, and all those other persons. If they had any objection to raise at all it was against the time-limit clause as a whole, and not specially on behalf of the leaseholder as distinct from those other persons. Therefore, the case for this Amendment disappeared, and they came back to the general discussion of the time-limit. Their answer on the main point was simply that with regard to the leaseholder as with regard to the freeholder, or with regard to the brewery company which issued debentures, at the end of the time-limit they would have still in their possession the actual buildings which they had undertaken to rent, and on which the mortgage or the debentures had been issued. With regard to monopoly value it was their duty during the interval to put by a sum sufficient to enable them to meet the obligations they had entered into. The question resolved itself into the larger issue whether or not the time given was sufficient for the purpose. There was no reason whatever for drawing any discrimination between various classes of persons.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said he did not propose to dwell on what the hon. Member had described as the larger issue, because he had spoken on that, but a few words had fallen from the hon. Gentleman on which he wished to speak. In the first place he had criticised very severely the action of his hon. friend in having put down an Amendment, the general purport of which was perfectly clear, without at the same time having put down all the consequential Amendments required to carry it out in detail. He could not imagine a criticism coming with a worse grace from the Treasury Bench, or anything more inconsistent with Parliamentary convenience or Parliamentary practice than the way in which they had treated the House. They came down in the morning and found they were expected to discuss Amendments of which no notice had ever been given, and of which they had no conception when the Closure Resolution was moved, and that without a word of explanation or apology. He would be out of order if he were to pursue that subject further. He only mentioned it in order to say he hoped they would hear no more as to putting down Amendments without notice. No crime, in respect of drafting, would equal in magnitude those which the Government were in the habit of committing. The only other issue which the hon. Gentleman raised besides the broader issue which he left to others to discuss was that this only dealt with one point of a general grievance. That might be true, but he had yet to learn that it was an adequate reason for not accepting an Amendment dealing with a small portion of a grievance that it left a large portion of the grievance still unredressed. Beyond the attack on his hon. friend on the drafting point, the hon. Gentleman had said literally nothing against the Amendment except that there were other grievances, similar in character and not less in magnitude, affecting brewers, landlords, and other classes. But that was no reason why they should not deal with the leaseholder, and he could not imagine that anything which had so far fallen from the Government supplied an adequate reason why the Amendment should be withdrawn.

*MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said it was a little difficult to understand why the hon. Gentleman should make any point at all about the drafting of the Amendment unless the Government were prepared, if the Amendment was properly drafted, to accept the spirit of it. The hon. Gentleman had not told them, and it must be assumed that the Government was not prepared to accept the spirit of any such Amendment. Therefore, it was no use criticising its drafting. On the merits of the Amendment which had received such perfunctory treatment there was, perhaps, a point of considerable substance. The hon. Gentleman said there was no difference in quality, and he gathered his view was that there was no difference in extent either, between the grievance of the leaseholder and the grievance of the freeholder. Therefore the suggestion was made that his hon. friend was ill-advised and inconsistent when he attempted to apply

a partial remedy to the case of the leaseholder, whereas the only logical resource open to him was to deal with both the case of the leaseholder and the case of the freeholder. Five minutes of reflection would show how ill-founded such a position was. The hon. Gentleman said the leaseholder was in exactly the same position as the debenture holder. What the Government had told them from the First Reading until the present day was that under the magnanimous provisions of the Bill in fourteen years the debenture holders could all pay themselves off. They were told that this was an annual licence and it was only the good fortune of the licensed victuallers that they happened to be governed by a Ministry of unexampled generosity who had given them fourteen years to cover their financial loss in regard to something for which they were only entitled to one year's compensation. What had they to say with regard to the leaseholder with forty or sixty-five years still to run of licensed premises which were not worth the rent now being paid for any other purpose at all? If they would not produce that rental for any other purpose, what was the use of saying that such a leaseholder was in the position of a debenture-holder who could recoup himself in fourteen years? Such a proposition would not stand examination for a single moment. He would take for example the case which had constantly arisen in his own experience in the Courts—the application of a man who had taken a lease of premises say for sixty or seventy years. Those men were not wealthy brewers, but they were persons who in order to take advantage of the licence which they had been fortunate enough to obtain must of necessity borrow money and could only carry on their business by extensive loans. Now what was the position of those men who had incurred such large pecuniary obligations to enable them to take up the licence? They would ask themselves as business men whether a licence was a security on the strength of which they were entitled to borrow money. Practically there could only be one answer to that question. With regard to the criticism made by the hon. Member for Hackney of the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley's connection with a financial paper, he wished to say that on the Opposition Benches they did not make the slightest attack upon the good faith or earnestness with which the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley had championed his view of the case for many years. At the time the right hon. Gentleman was the responsible editor of that paper he must have been aware of the tenor of the articles appearing in it. Supposing one of those persons who obtained a licence wished to decide whether it was wise to borrow a large sum of money over a period of years he would say to himself: "Is it a good investment and is there a reasonable prospect of the permanence of the licence?" Financial papers like the one which was edited by the Member for Spen Valley would be ready to advise him that it was a good investment.

In the case of Belton against the London County Council it was contended by the present Lord Justice Moulton that when taking licensed premises where there was a reversionary right there ought not to be compensation on the assumption that the lease gave an expectation. The learned counsel said that they ought not to compensate the holder of the reversionary interest, because the licence was only an annual right. That contention was carefully considered, and it was decided that there was no such limitation, and that it had the value which a reasonable expectation must be allowed to possess, and that was the market value. If a man took up a lease for seventy years at £300 or £400 a year, of premises which if not used for a licensed victuallers' business would not be worth £100 a year, were they going to propose to saddle that man with a loss of the difference for a period of forty or fifty years? It was preposterous to say that there was no injustice in such a case, and it was an injustice which hon. Members opposite must be conscious that the country would never allow them to commit. For argument's sake he would assume that the Government were right from the moral point of view and that the policy of the reduction of licences on this Bill was a sane and well-considered policy. Surely it was possible to achieve those moral objects and at the same time deal adequately and even liberally with men who had been encouraged by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite and their predecessors to invest their money in the trade.

When the Member for the Spen Valley said that everybody had received a warning that the State could repossess itself of that which it ought never to have parted with, two distinct propositions were involved: first, that the State ought never to have parted with it; and, secondly, that, having parted with it, the State could place itself at any moment in the same position as if it had never parted with it. But the fundamental truth of all this was that the State had actually parted with it. Let them assume that it had done so for misguided reasons. The Leader of the Opposition said last night most convincingly that the trade did possess and had been held by every legal tribunal to possess the right to be compensated on the market value which had been judged by lawyers and by men of business, and had been assessed by ordinary business methods which were always applied when considering value. It was impossible to deny the justice of that method. The Government might refuse to accept this Amendment, but he ventured to call the attention of private Members of the House, many of whom he knew were profoundly and seriously concerned in this matter, to the fact that the moral object of this Bill could be secured without injustice, and he hoped that even at the eleventh hour they would resolve that they could serve that moral purpose better by dissociating themselves from this proposal.

MR. SHERWELL (Huddersfield) thought the Leader of the Opposition had entirely misconstrued the logical meaning of the statement made by the Under-Secretary, who was quite right in the interpretation he had placed upon this Amendment, which the Opposition must realise did in its very essence, spirit, and intent raise the whole question of the length of the time-limit. The mover of the Amendment had stated that those who had invested in reversionary interests had no reason to believe before Sharpe v. Wakefield that their investments were in jeopardy.

Mr. E. E. Smith.

Surely when the hon. Member made that statement he was oblivious of the fact that in 1871 there was introduced in this House a responsible proposal for a time-limit of ten years.

MR. JAMES HOPE: And so unpopular was it in the country that the Bill never got to a Second Reading.

MR. SHERWELL said that The Times—an organ of public opinion to whose weight and authority hon. Gentleman on the other side would defer—in commenting on the proposal of Mr. Bruce, wrote in 1871—

“Every public-house for some years past must have been taken with full notice of prospective amendments in the law, not to speak of possible additions to rates and taxes.” Speaking of the actual terms of the compensation proposed, The Times wrote—

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think the remarks which the hon. Member is making would be more appropriate on the next Amendment. We are only dealing now with the exception in the case of leaseholders, and the hon. Member appears to be addressing himself to the wider question

MR. SHERWELL said he would, of course, bow to the ruling of the Chairman, but he desired to say that he was only referring to a line of argument adopted on the opposite side. The purpose of this Amendment was to show that the precise term of time-limit suggested in the Bill was inadequate to compensate those who had invested their money in licensed premises. There were many hon. Members sitting on the Ministerial side who were prepared to consider any reasonable argument on that particular head, but what they objected to was the attempt to discredit the whole proposal of a time-limit on matters of detail. The onus of proving that the time-limit proposed by the Government was not sufficient lay with hon. Gentlemen opposite and not with those who were satisfied with the proposals of the Government.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not confining himself to the Amendment.

MR. SHERWELL said he would reserve his remarks until the next Amendment was proposed.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said that this Amendment brought before the Committee the precise injustice which was inflicted by the proposals of the Government. He was not without hope that some hon. Members at least would bring themselves to see what was the real point of the objection to this subsection. The Under-Secretary for the Home Department had said that, if this Amendment were accepted, they would introduce unfairness as between different licence-holders; but that was not the real point. He rather agreed with the hon. Gentleman that a freeholder who entered into a contract had a strong claim of a similar character to that of the leaseholder who had entered into a contract. But that was not the real point. The real point of the Opposition objection was that of people who entered into contracts under one condition of the law, and if the law were changed and a different situation created, upon whom injustice was thereby inflicted. The injustice was not got rid of in the case that the Committee were considering by the Government declaring that the injustice was no worse than the injustice often inflicted in other cases. The Under-Secretary made no answer on this point except by saying that the people affected ought to insure, that they ought to create a sinking fund during the fourteen years, and then they would be able to apply that fund in liquidation of any loss incurred. How was that contention consistent with the proposition that no loss was being inflicted? If the Government admitted that at the end of the licence term there would be a loss which had to be met by the creation of a sinking fund, then they admitted the whole case against the Bill. Who would contend that if a property was taken away from a man no loss was being inflicted upon him because he ought to insure against the loss? Take the case of a burglary—and he did not say that this Bill was burglary—in which the argument was the same. What defence would it be for a burglar to say: “Oh! if the man had only insured against burglary he would not have suffered any loss.” The argument was perfectly nonsensical. He was sure that neither the Under-Secretary nor the Solicitor-General could believe in that aspect of the Bill. They could not say they were not inflicting any loss upon the licence-holder because if he had a sinking fund the loss would be made up during the period. The hon. Member for Huddersfield had put the matter in a different way. He said: “It is quite true we are taking away something from the licence-holder, but we are not taking more than we might do by way of taxation.”

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think the noble Lord is not addressing himself to the Amendment now before the Committee.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not dispute that ruling, and he would not follow that line of argument. All he would say of the particular case was this. Here they had the clearest possible case reduced to pounds, shillings and pence. Men who had spent large sums of money on their property and had agreed to onerous contracts in the belief that their licences were to be renewed year after year found by this clause that the right of renewal was being taken away, in addition to a fresh obligation being put upon them to pay a great deal of money. In this way the Government were forcing upon these men a different set of circumstances from those in which they entered into their contracts, and they were transferring the burden which ought to be shared between landlord and tenant entirely to the tenant, and allowing the landlord to go free of the burden. That was a clear case of hardship.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir S. EVANS, Glamorganshire, Mid.) said he hoped the Committee would come to a decision on this Amendment for the reason that they had not much time to discuss the larger question which was to come up afterwards. [An HON. MEMBER: Whose fault is that?] He was not saying whose fault it was; he was only pointing out the fact. The case put forward by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment was not that of the short leaseholder but that of the long leaseholder. He did not understand what the noble Lord meant by loss. The phrase ought to be properly defined before the Committee could discuss it. But the point of the Amendment was clear. Assuming that the policy of the Government was right—namely, that there should be a time-limit—the only question that arose was: “Ought there to be an exception in the case of leaseholders, whether long or short?” Supposing a man before 5th April, 1908, intended to carry on his own business and bought a freehold. He gave the full value for it, with all the anticipations that every purchaser or investor under such terms would have. But, suppose in the next street, a brewery company took a sixty years’ lease under the same conditions, with the anticipation and prospect of what legislation might be hereafter. The meaning of passing this Amendment would be that the man in his own freehold would have to pay the monopoly value after fourteen years, whereas the brewery company would be exempt for sixty years from the monopoly value. That was the sole point raised by the Amendment.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.) said the issue involved here was a narrow one. If a man was a leaseholder, he could not get rid of his obligations—he could not sell them in the open market. He was bound under his contract for a period of years. A freeholder could get rid of his. Was the leaseholder on whom this Bill would cast expense to get no relief?

*MR. GRETTON (Rutland) said he did not wish to go into the general arguments. The Amendment, as he understood it, was for the purpose of relieving the leaseholder of penalties when the time-limit came to an end. The majority of these leases were for long terms, and many had fifty years and upwards still unexpired. He wanted to make it clear that this point did not affect brewery companies so much as retail licence-holders. In nearly every case there was an increased price charged for a lease if there was a licence attached to it. It had been recognised by the law of the land that that enhanced value was an obligation on the leaseholder, who, if he lost his licence, had to meet that obligation. The Bill proposed to take away licences at the end of fourteen years without any compensation whatever. At the end of the time-limit, whatever that limit might be, the long leaseholder would be left with the obligation to pay the increased rental. The Government said that they could not accept the Amendment. Were they going to break contracts? Most of these leases had been taken up under a contract to preserve the licence; and if the licence were lost during the term of the leasehold, the leaseholder was under penalties to pay a lump sum down at the termination of the lease. There was another point. When premises were fitted up and adapted for a licensed trade, they were not adapted to other classes of business. If the licence were lost, alterations in the premises would be required in order to adapt them to some other business, so that rent might be obtained for them between the termination of the time-limit and the termination of the leasehold. That would be a tax on the leaseholder, who would have to spend a lump sum of money in order to alter and adapt the premises for some other trade or business. Such cases were exceptionally hard, and the Government, he was sure, had not realised the impasse into which they were leading the committee. If they were not prepared to accept the Amendment, they would have to meet this case in some form or other or they would find themselves in a dilemma which would raise an uproar and outcry in the country among some of those who were at present inclined to support the Bill in the belief that it was just to the leaseholders.

MR. JAMES HOPE said that the answer to the Solicitor-General was that the leaseholder was really subject to time-limit already. The time-limit was the limit of his lease, and the leaseholder had to make all his arrangements so as to make himself secure at the end of his lease. Now, the Government were making him attempt to do that in fourteen years, whereas, at present he had the whole period of his lease in which to do it.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

After the Chairman had announced the figures of the division—

MR. GRAYSON (Yorkshire, W. R., Colne Valley) said: Mr. Chairman, before you proceed with the next Amendment to the clause, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that, as I stated yesterday, there are thousands of people dying in the streets while you are trifling with this Bill. [Cries of "Order."] I shall not keep order. I am alone in this House, but I am going to fight.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member—

MR. GRAYSON: I refuse to keep order. [Cries of "Sit down."] I defy you to silence me.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order.

MR. GRAYSON: I will not keep order. I am alone in this House, but I have a large mandate behind me, and I refuse to allow the House to proceed while I am in it.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. Member—

MR. GRAYSON: The people I represent—[Cries of "Order" and "Sit down," and ironical laughter.] This is not a matter for laughter and callous indifference.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. [Cries of "Order, order" and "Sit down."]

MR. GRAYSON: I absolutely refuse to sit down in this Chamber while it refuses to do something for the people who are starving wholesale. I refuse to wait another moment. [Renewed cries of "Order."]

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. Will the hon. Member allow me to ask this question: Does he understand that the House is in Committee, that the Committee can only deal with what the House instructs it to deal with, and that until I report progress we can deal with nothing else?

MR. GRAYSON: Then I will move that you report progress.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot move to report progress, because that is not allowed to anybody except a member of the Government, under the special Resolution dealing with this Bill. If the hon. Member wishes to raise this question, he should do so in the House, and not in Committee.

MR. GRAYSON: Yes, Sir, the point I want to make is—[Renewed cries of "Order," and "Sit down."]

MR. GRAYSON: I shall not sit down.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member refuse to obey the orders of the Chair?

MR. GRAYSON: Quite so, Sir. I feel this matter so deeply that I must refuse to obey the Rules of the House.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must direct the hon. Member to resume his seat.

MR. GRAYSON: I know there is force and machinery enough in this House to compel me to sit down and to remove me from the House. I wish to say that I refuse to obey your orders, Mr. Emmott. [Renewed cries of "Order, order."] I know very well that Members of every section of the House are pledged to the Licensing Bill, but I refuse to obey— [Cries of "Order, order."]

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has refused to obey my instructions to resume his seat, and I therefore order him to withdraw from the House for the remainder of the sitting.

MR. GRAYSON: I refuse to withdraw from the House voluntarily, until the House has given some intimation of an attempt to attend to this urgent matter of unemployment—

*THE CHAIRMAN: I want the hon. Member to understand what his conduct means. If he refuses to obey my order to leave the House, then I must name him, and the sitting will be suspended and the Speaker will be sent for.

MR. GRAYSON: I cannot help that. I refuse to permit the business of the House to go on until the House considers the people who are starving. [Cries of "Order" and "Withdraw."]

*THE CHAIRMAN: Then, in that case, I name you, Mr. Victor Grayson, for disobeying the orders of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN then left the Chair to report the circumstance to the House.

MR. GRAYSON: You cannot shame me. [Ironical laughter and cries of "Withdraw."] It is all very well for Members to laugh. [General cries of "Order, order."] Members have been always willing to adopt that attitude towards this question. [Renewed cries of "Order, order."] I shall obstruct the proceedings so long as the House refuses to consider this question.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. EMMOTT reported that Mr. GRAYSON had been named by him to the Committee as disregarding the authority of the Chair.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Grayson be suspended from the service of the House,"—(Mr. Asquith,)—put, and agreed to.

*MR. SPEAKER, addressing Mr. Grayson, said: I have to inform the hon. Member that he is suspended from the service of the House, and I must ask him to leave the House.

MR. GRAYSON: I leave the House, as I said yesterday, with pleasure, because I feel that no man—[Loud cries of "Order"]—can stay in this House another moment. [Renewed cries of "Order."]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to address the House after he has been suspended.

MR. GRAYSON: Well, then, I leave the House, as I said before, feeling that I have gained in dignity by leaving this institution, and I hope that—[The remainder of the sentence could not be heard in consequence of loud cries of "Order."]

The hon. Member having started to go out of the Chamber turned back again and loudly exclaimed: "This House is a House of murderers." He then withdrew.

LICENSING BILL.

Again considered in Committee.

*MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.) said the object of the Amendment he desired to submit to the Committee was to extend the period of the time-limit from fourteen to twenty-one years. He was aware that by the Resolution of the Committee last night the principle of the time-limit was no longer before them, and he would endeavour to avoid any discussion of the matter from that point of view, but he was encouraged to move the extension of the period by the fact that the Prime Minister had more than once intimated to the House that Clause 1, fixing the reduction period, did not necessarily govern Clause 3. The grounds upon which he asked the Committee to say that the time-limit in the clause was too short were, first, that the whole thing had been thrown on the trade by way of surprise, and secondly, even if that point failed, it was impossible for any prudent trader interested in this trade to make adequate provision for the redemption of his licence within the proposed period of fourteen years. As to the first point, it was frequently contended that whether the time-limit was fourteen or twenty-one years, or any other period, the trade had been fully warned that some time-limit would probably be enacted, and in the discussion of a subsection which occupied the time of the Committee the night before, he ventured to indicate, so far as the chief champion of that view was concerned, it was a novel point of view for him to take. He wished to say especially after a word or two with the right hon. Gentleman, that nothing was further from his desire than to impugn the absolute integrity and good faith of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spen Valley, and he accepted without any reservation his personal assurance that, whatever might have appeared in the City Oracle in the way of financial answers, he was not primarily responsible for it, although he was responsible. But when the right hon. Gentleman said that, he could not help asking the Committee what would be said of a licensed victualler charged with allowing intoxication on his premises, who pleaded that, owing to pressure of work, he had overlooked the matter. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to extend the same generous consideration and allowance to the members of the trade as he asked for himself in this particular matter. It was said that the trade and the investing section of the public had been warned that some kind of time-limit was imminent, and in proof of this, the Member for the Spen Valley called attention last night to the fact that in 1891, about the time of Sharpe v. Wakefield, an institution was established called the Licences Insurance Corporation. If he inadvertently did an injustice to that Corporation when he said it was not doing the flourishing business which was anticipated, he apologised. He was misled again by the right hon. Gentleman's journal, because he found that when that company was being offered to the public, and when the right hon. Gentleman, it was said, knew very well, and every licensed victualler ought to have known very well, that the danger was imminent, and of the pressing necessity of insuring against losing his licence, the right hon. Gentleman's journal said—

“In our opinion, the idea of the Licences Insurance Corporation is a good one, but whether the company will ever secure the business for which it caters we cannot say.”

He thought that quotation justified the view which he took at that time, and which the right hon. Gentleman himself took, that there was no imminent danger. When the hon. Member for Tyneside was speaking last night, he interrupted him to say that he had established by quotations from the right hon. Gentleman's journal that he had held out to the public that brewery investments were intrinsically sound. The hon. Member had called his attention to the fact that he had not done so, and, therefore, simply for the purpose of keeping good faith with the Committee, he desired to read one quotation, typical of many others, in the general answers—

“Brewery Shares.—We should hold these shares. They represent very sound property.” He only mentioned these matters in aid of his argument that, even at the time of Sharpe v. Wakefield, subject to good behaviour and the requirements of the district, the expectation of the renewal of a licence was a thing of which any Court of equity would take cognisance, upon which any ordinarily prudent trustees could invest money, and which, as a matter of fact, did lead to the investment of an enormous amount of capital by perfectly innocent people. After Sharpe v. Wakefield and up to the time the Act of 1904 was passed the average annual number of licences disallowed was thirty-two. Therefore it was obvious that whatever discretion the justices had they quite understood after Sharpe v. Wakefield it must be very judiciously exercised, with the result that the Act of 1904 was passed under which the man who lost his licence was reimbursed by his fellow tradesmen for the loss of his property. He did not wish to weary the Committee by abstruse calculations as to how far under a limit of fourteen years it was possible for a licensee to redeem his property. He desired to take one concrete and governing case in support of his contention that the time-limit of fourteen years was too short—the case of the last of the licences sold by His Majesty's Government. He thought there could not be a stronger argument submitted to the Prime Minister than that he should be able to show that the licence recently sold by the Government to a purchaser in the open market, which, under the operation of this clause, must go in fourteen years, must of necessity involve a very heavy financial loss on the purchaser. It was said, yesterday, by the Secretary of State for War, that the purchaser of the "Coach and Horses" was thoroughly satisfied with his bargain. He had in his hand a circular, dated 12th March, 1908, which had been issued by the purchaser, and in which he complained bitterly that, within a few months of paying his £10,000 to the Government, this "confiscation Bill," as he discourteously called it, was sprung upon him. This was how the purchaser dealt with the question of the time-limit, and if any member or supporter of the Government could answer his argument, he would be quite prepared to withdraw his Amendment.

"I assume £10,000 to have been the reserve placed upon the property at the sale, as there were bids against me to that amount. . . . The Government must have known their intentions, when they fixed their reserve and accepted the full market value of the property as licensed premises, of introducing (less than six months later) a confiscation Bill, which, if passed into law, will deprive my company of at least three-fourths of the amount they duped me into paying. I have had this property valued, minus the licence, by three of the principal firms of valuers in Portsmouth, with the following results."

He gave the names of the valuers, and their figures were £2,500, £1,950, and £1,000—

"giving an average of £2,150 as the value of the whole of the land, with the bricks and mortar. In the common division of brewery holdings, one-third ordinary shares, one-third preference shares, and one-third debenture stock, the investment would work out as follows: £3,333 6s. 8d. ordinary shares, £3,333 6s. 8d. preference shares, £3,333 6s. 8d. debenture stock. With a time-limit as proposed in the Government Bill the whole of the ordinary shares would disappear, the whole of the preference shares would disappear, and, accepting the mean valuation at the figure quoted, £1,183 6s. 8d. belonging to the mortgage debenture stockholders would also be lost. The futility of the contention that the capital value of the licence could be written off in the time-limit suggested in the confiscation Bill is self-evident. I am able to prove that the profit secured by rent and trade on this investment is 3½ per cent. It would be impossible to write off the capital value of the licence as assessed by the Government in any time-limit."

He would not read the peroration with which he concluded, because it was not quite suitable for a business argument, but here was a case of a man acquainted with the trade purchasing, at a price fixed by the Government, a licensed property, and by the operation of this clause passed within a few months of the completion of that purchase they had this solemn statement by the purchaser, which, unless it was confuted by the Prime Minister, meant that of necessity he must lose two-thirds of the purchase price, of which he was to make a present to the Government who sold him the property. That was one case. The purchaser there represented a brewery company. He would take one other case, which was the case of a publican. Quite recently a man with whom he was acquainted, and who owned two large licensed houses in London, died. Upon his applying to the solicitor to the estate he was told that the following was the effect of this Licensing Bill. One of the houses was held on a lease of which there was an unexpired term of thirty-seven years to run, at an annual rental of £150. That house was valued for the purposes of probate at £29,000, and the present mortgage upon it was £37,455. The other house was valued for probate at £17,000, and the value of the mortgage was £26,000. The valuer told him that but for the present proposals of the Government the valuation of the goodwill of the two houses would have been increased to the extent of £25,000, and further, that if this time-limit of fourteen years prevailed it would be impossible to set aside out of the earnings of this property a sufficient sum to allow any margin whatever for the maintenance of the widow or the education of the children. There was a tragedy in a picture of that kind. He happened to be well acquainted with the family of the deceased man, who died suddenly at an early age. The children were being well brought up and receiving a good education. They were respectable people in every way. The man, by his industry and energy, his vigilance and enterprise in the conduct of these houses, upon which a slur had never been cast, believed he had made provision for his family. Yet he was scarcely dead when the solicitor who had the conduct of his affairs showed that by the operation of this Bill the family had become practically paupers. If a state of things like that could happen, the Government surely could not resist the contention that a fourteen years time-limit was inadequate. He therefore suggested it should be increased to twenty-one years, not because he believed that twenty-one years was sufficient to enable proper provision to be made, but because he thought that possibly a compromise to that effect might be conceded, in which case those persons holding licensed property would be so much better off than they otherwise would be. He had been struck by some very remarkable features of this discussion. The hon. Member for West Aberdeen had made a most interesting speech. He exhibited the spectacle of a stern Scottish temperance reformer championing the brewers. He had pointed out that they had had plenty of time within this time-limit to make provision, and had declaimed loudly on the fact that compensation had been paid in cases where none was due, and that therefore the trade had been deceived. He (Mr. Bottomley) was sure that the trade was grateful to the hon. Member and he hoped that the hon. Gentleman would continue to show the same solicitude when he saw that the trade was likely to be defrauded, whether by the State or by an individual. Then there had been the spectacle of the hon. Member for Tyneside, one of the most cultured agnostics in the country, championing the cause of the Nonconformist conscience. The hon. Member, had referred to him as a distinguished and successful financier. He hoped he might be entitled to claim that description. At any rate, he did not know of any reason why he should not. However that might be, he claimed to be a successful journalist, and he hoped as a journalist he should never select the argument that anything which appeared in his paper appeared there without his responsibility simply because he had not physically and actually written it. The point he wished to make to the Committee was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spen Valley had allowed this temperance movement, as it was called, to become his obsession. Other earnest temperance reformers were in the same position. The again the words "temperance party" were almost an insult. It was certainly an anomaly in the Parliamentary life of this country that there should be a so-called temperance party. He did not think that anyone who was in opposition to this Bill would like to be called a member of the intemperance party. Anybody who took part in this debate, whatever attitude he might take with reference to this Bill, was alive to the evil of intemperance, the opponents to this Bill just as much as the most ardent and enthusiastic temperance reformer. It was a waste of time to tell them about the evil; they could not walk a yard without realising it. But the imposition of a time-limit of fourteen years, and that was why he desired to make it longer, came as a great shock to the conscience of the public. Rightly or wrongly, people had arrived at the idea that some injustice was being done to their fellow-citizens, and no Act of Parliament which gave rise to that idea could obtain the moral sanction of the community. If the Government could concede another seven years to the time-limit, that would be some satisfaction to popular feeling. People would say that the trade had so much longer to protect itself. Not only the trade, but other people who had invested their money in these things—that they also had a better chance of protecting themselves against the effect of this Bill. Fourteen years had been shown to be absolutely insufficient to enable the trade to protect themselves, and therefore they should be given a better chance. It was the organic principle of the articles of faith of the Liberal Party that there should be equality of opportunity and fair play for every section of the population: therefore he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 9, to leave out from the first word 'the,' to the word 'compensation,' in order to insert the words '5th day of April, 1930.'"—(Mr. Bottomley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) said that as he had put a similar Amendment upon the Paper he felt compelled to support the hon. Member for South Hackney, and should follow him into the division lobby. He hoped the Government would see their way to say that this fourteen years was not a hard and fast time-limit which could not be altered. There was a general feeling that there should be some extra time over and above the period of the fourteen years during which the trade had to pay compensation to those whose licences were suppressed in order that those which were left might to a certain extent recoup themselves. This Amendment did not affect the question of the reduction of licences, which, as he understood, was the main principle of the Bill. But the Amendment did affect a very large and valuable class of property held by people all over the country. The value of these licences had been estimated at anything between £95,000,000 and £150,000,000. He was not lawyer enough to be able to say whether licences were actual property or not because their value was based on great expectations which had been formed by the trade. At the same time those expectations were sufficiently good and sound to enable these licences to be bought and sold. In other words, those who bought them knew exactly what their value was and what the state of the law was. The main fact was uncontroverted that if this Bill did not become law these licences at the end of fourteen years would be of very much the same value as they were to-day, but that if this Bill were passed into law with this time-limit they would be worth nothing. Under the Bill the Government were going to transfer the millions of money represented by these licences from the pockets of the people who held them into the hands of the State. They were told that a time-limit made all the difference, and in a sense of course it did, because it enabled a sinking fund to be formed, during which the trade could set aside a sum of money yearly to meet this vast change in their condition; but he ventured to think that fourteen years was too short a time to enable the trade to do that. If they invested their money at 4 per cent. to raise a certain sum in fifteen years, they had to put away 5½ per cent. of the capital they wished to raise yearly. The trade ought to expect a fair return from the money invested in it, and they might take 8 per cent. as a fair return, and if they had to put away 5½ per cent. of their capital value it would leave them a small return indeed to meet the actual charges on that trade. If they took a twenty-one years time-limit they had a slightly better state of affairs. They were told that these breweries were very rich companies with vast reserves, out of which they could pay these heavy charges. That might be so in some cases, but there were a great many of these houses owned by private individuals, and it did not seem to him really to affect the issue whether they were owned by wealthy brewers or not, because they had to consider whether these charges could be met by a reasonably prudent trader. There was another aspect of the question. A time-limit would immediately affect the market value of the whole of these securities to a very great extent. They were based at present on the expectation that these licences would be renewed, and they were bought and sold as if the licences would be renewed in perpetuity. If they put in a term of fourteen years they immediately dropped the value of those licences by something like 50 per cent. the very first year of their time-limit, and as it went on it would decrease to vanishing point. He would urge that the test of this question was what the ordinary prudent trader could do who had to meet the ordinary trade risks and make the ordinary business profit. He knew that all this class of property had always been subject to fresh legislation and that they should have been prepared to meet fresh legislation, but he did not think it was fair to say that they ought to have been prepared to meet legislation with a fourteen years time-limit. They might say that railway companies ought to be prepared to meet the possibility of all their lines becoming national property, but he thought in this Bill they were putting the case too high against the ordinary prudent trader. It had always been the practice of Parliament not to bring about violent disturbances of property without careful compensation being awarded, and he hoped in this case that course would not be departed from. If this Bill was to become law it would have to commend itself to the ordinary fair man in the street, and it would not do that unless they extended their time-limit to twenty-one years.

*MR. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton) said he supposed that, this Amendment having been moved by the hon. Member for South Hackney, the Amendment in his name would naturally go overboard. His Amendment was to reduce the time-limit to twelve months instead of extending it to twenty-one years. He was opposed to compensation in any shape or form for the liquor traffic. He was not one of those who thought the liquor traffic was a gigantic charity organisation carried on for the moral, intellectual, and spiritual benefit of widows and orphans. He held more the opinion of the late Lord Randolph Churchill that it was a devilish and destructive traffic, and for that reason he was not prepared to vote for compensation either in the way of hard cash or money to be provided by Parliament, and if there was to be a time-limit twelve months was long enough for him. He was quite aware that the Act of 1904 had given them to some extent a vested interest, but they never had one before then. They knew they never had one. If they took the first Licensing Act of any moment, that of 1828, they would find it laid down by Lord Brougham that the licensing justices had absolute discretion. They could renew the licence of a house that had been conducted, and badly conducted, for only twelve months, and they could refuse the licence of a house that had been conducted for fifty years and had been conducted well. That was proved up to the hilt by the celebrated case of Sharpe v. Wakefield. If they had to have a time-limit, one extending beyond one year was too long for him. The time-limits of the past had been expended by now. The Royal Commission of 1899 (Minority Report) recommended a time-limit of seven years. Those seven years had flown and two others along with them. In 1893 the Bishop of Chester introduced a Bill into the House of Lords, and he suggested that five years notice should be given to the licence holders that after the expiration of that time they would be annual licences, but since that Bill was introduced, in addition to the five years, another ten years had flown. In 1876 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham proposed that they should have compensation to the tune of five years purchase on the average annual profit. Since then not only had the five years flown, but twenty-seven years as well. In 1871 Mr. Bruce proposed in his Bill a time-limit of ten years, and since then there had flown in addition to the ten years twenty-seven years. Therefore he submitted to the House that for the Government to come along at this date and put on the top of all those warnings and proposals another time-limit of fourteen years was altogether more than met the necessities of the case, and he would appeal to the Government that they were setting a very dangerous precedent in compensating expectations. The hon. Member for Tyneside yesterday said that the late Mr. Gladstone had once fallen into the pit of thinking that all the landowners should have compensation for the abolition of the corn laws because of their expectations, and they would have the same thing when they came to deal, say, with education. Now that the denominational schools had been thrown on to the rates would they not want compensation for expectations when they took them off? Notwithstanding all that, when the Chairman put the Question from the Chair, he would be so inconsistent as to vote "that these words stand part," and he trusted an overwhelming majority of the House would put the reduction period in the Bill at fourteen years, and that the Government would set their faces like a flint so as not to allow the other House to extend the period by one day.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln) said there were two points involved in this Amendment. The mover said he moved it because of his zeal for temperance reform. He did not question his zeal, but he was postponing the most valuable temperance reforms in this Bill from fourteen to twenty-one years. He should express his zeal for temperance reform in some better way than that. His other point was a question of whether the liquor sellers were really able to write down their capital within the period of fourteen years without suffering excessive loss, and he instanced the case especially of the "Coach and Horses." He said that fourteen years was a shock to the consciences of the British public, and that twenty-one years would relieve their feelings; but surely that was a somewhat vague method of treatment. He had heard from the benches on the other side that this was a question of actuarial discussion, and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition said it was the sort of question on which no bishop dared express an opinion. In this discussion let them then get a closer grip with the facts and have some more definite statements than the mere case of the "Coach and Horses." There were two points in that case, one being that no sufficient notice of the intentions of the Government were given to Sir William Dupree, but he thought there was. Statements of Members of the Government could be quoted during all the months preceding the purchase of that house. They were recorded in the liquor trade papers, and it was common knowledge, but that was a small point; they knew it very well.

AN HON. MEMBER: Knew what?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said they knew, in the words of the Home Secretary, that—

"No solution of the question could be satisfactory which did not ultimately effect the transfer of the licence value, or the monopoly value; the Government were pledged to deal with the question at the very first opening of the next session."

That was on 7th June, 1907, and it was taken into account by the Brewery Debenture Holders Committee. Member after Member of the Government during 1907 and also in 1906, had repeatedly stated that they were going to deal with a comprehensive measure of licensing reform. That must have been present in the mind of Sir William Dupree.

MR. YOUNGER: What about the promise of the Prime Minister that there was to be no confiscation or injustice?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: The Prime Minister said there was to be no confiscation or injustice, but he went on to say—

"What would amount to confiscation was a matter on which opinions would probably differ."

He had a letter of Sir William Dupree which he had studied, and, in the first place, Sir William said in reference to the "Coach and Horses," that he had no grievance over the purchase. The actual words were—

"My only object was to show that six months before the introduction of the Bill, the licence was sold by the Government for £7,500."

"Under the law of value existing at the time of the purchase," he had no reason to be dissatisfied with the purchase, and, in fact, if he had wished to get rid of it, trade competitors would have been very glad to relieve him of that purchase.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall): Would they now?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: Oh, yes. I understand so.

SIR F. BANBURY: Because they know the Bill will never pass.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: How do you know that?

SIR F. BANBURY: The bye-elections show it.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: They were elections in which the other side polled a minority vote during the time that the Licensing Bill was before the country.

SIR F. BANBURY: Haggerston.

\*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: I am taking the votes of the years' elections altogether, and that is a fact. Continuing, the Member said in reference to the contention that the licence value of the "Coach and Horses" was worth £7,500, and that the site and structure were worth £2,500, Sir William Dupree said he was only getting  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on that purchase. That, frankly, was incredible. He was a member of a compensation authority, and he knew quite well that if Sir William was only getting  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the purchase the licence value could not be £7,500. Either he had got at least £900 (£750 from trade and £125 from rent) in which case the licence value was worth £7,500, or else the value of the licence was only £3,750; or else if he was getting  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. from rent and profit together the value of the licence was £2,500. That was the utmost any trade valuer would give him; no trade valuer in his senses would value at a higher price if that was all Sir William was getting. He took it that he had got £900 a year at least, and therefore, £7,500, was the market value. Under the Kennedy judgment he must be making £900 a year out of his wholesale property, otherwise the licence would not be worth that. Therefore, he had £900 to play with. The hon. Member for Aberdeenshire had stated on the previous night that these values were being compensated on the basis of ten years purchase, and therefore during the period of fifteen years it was possible to pay 5 per cent. on capital, and at the same time write off the whole of the capital value. If he had to write off the whole of that £7,500, then out of the profits he was making he could pay himself  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the whole capital— $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the ordinary shares, 5 per cent. on the preference shares, and 4 per cent. on the debenture stock, and yet get back the whole of the capital at the end of the term. That really depended on the arithmetical ratio which had been established under the Kennedy judgment. Any licence value which could be justified under the Kennedy judgment, must have corresponding to it a return of 10 per cent. annual profits. This meant that the whole of the licence value could be paid off in fifteen years with a return of  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the whole capital. That was one justification which might be fairly made for fixing the time-limit. They had many appeals to actuarial experts on the other side, but what he had to complain of was that the real facts were very rarely given in individual cases, the names of which they had the utmost difficulty in getting. The hon. and learned Member for the Walton division in his first reading speech said he would give them "the names, figures and calculations" of fifteen brewery companies. The hon. and learned Gentleman had supplied the names in such a way that he could only identify one, that of the largest of the number, and he was still waiting for the calculations. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had not treated the House quite frankly in this matter. He profoundly distrusted the actuarial calculations of trade experts. He had seen in the Compensation Courts that they always claimed as much as they could get for their clients. They perhaps got half of what they claimed, but unless one was in a position to check their figures, and go into the cases of the individual companies, one could not trust those actuarial experts. In regard to the fifteen brewery companies, the hon. and learned Member for the Walton division had placed their licence values at £22,127,651. But his answer to that was that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not give him an opportunity to go into the individual figures, except in one case, that of Watney, Coombe, Reid & Co. The hon. and learned Member had placed the total values of the licences belonging to this company at £7,728,621; but this must be exaggerated, because the total capitalisation of Watney, Coombe, Reid & Co., in its market valuation, fell to £6,356,916 in 1907. As he could not get the names of the individual companies, he could only say that the hon. and learned Gentleman had put the licence values of all the fifteen breweries at £22,127,651. If that was so, then, under the Kennedy judgment, there must be £2,217,000 of annual profits corresponding. This would allow 5 per cent. on the total licence values, and repay the whole of those values by 1923. If there was not that amount of annual profits, then the licence values were over-estimated and inflated. There must be that amount of annual profit to correspond to the values, under the Kennedy judgment. He would refer to one other case, that of Messrs. Wethered & Co., who lately wrote a letter to The Times saying they were prepared to allow the Government to send any expert to test their figures, and they would place all information at the disposal of the Government expert. All he could say was that Thomas Wethered & Co. seemed to be in a very flourishing condition. He would be very glad indeed if they would allow him to send in his expert, and he accepted their challenge. The company had paid 27 per cent. in 1902, and although their dividends were going down a bit, yet they were still pretty well up. On the average they had paid 20 per cent. from 1902 to 1906. They could pay 4 per cent. interest on debenture stock, 5 per cent. on preference shares, and 10 per cent. on ordinary shares, and yet he found by the 1906 balance sheet that there was left over for depreciation and sinking fund a sum which would replace, by 1923, a capital of £240,000. He found that all the public-houses, freehold and leasehold, belonging to this firm when it was registered in 1899, were valued at not more than £150,620. That included the site and structure, besides many cottages and some land. It was obvious that this firm could make proper provision by 1923. The monopoly value to be taken by the State in 1923 was only a small portion of the licence value. When he said small, he did not think it could be put higher than half of the licence value, which was the capitalisation of all the profits made in the house. Therefore he did not see that it was necessary to write off the whole of the licence value at the end of the time-limit because there would still be profits made out of the sale and manufacture of beer and spirits. The wholesale profits would continue to be made, and there would be capital value corresponding to those. The monopoly value could only be a portion of the licence value, for the licensees and wholesale traders must be able to get their ordinary profits at the expiration of the time-limit, in fact, they would get the profits which they would obtain if there were free trade in drink. Therefore, it would only be necessary to write off, not the whole but half of the licence value, and that would be enough. If that were so Sir William Dupree would have to write off only £187 10s. a year and he would still be able to get a sum approaching 8 per cent. on the total investment, and if he was prepared to be content with 3½ per cent. he thought he was very well off.

SIR F. BANBURY: Why don't you write that off?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: That really involved the whole question whether there was to be a time-limit or not. He admitted that the time-limit did mean a loss, but it was a loss which they might fairly ask the trade to prepare for, seeing that it was occasioned by the fact that at last, after long years of waiting, they asked that the value of the monopoly should be reserved to the State which the State had got a right to to-day. Taking the market values as they stood to-day, there was time for the liquor traders to write off these values and still leave themselves reasonable profits. What he had been saying was confirmed by what was said by Mr. Cripps, in 1904. He was the author of a standard book on "Compensation," and he said as Member of Parliament for Stretford in this House—

"If they introduced a twenty years' time-limit, the first effect would be not to diminish the amount to the householders, but to give them an unfair amount of compensation to which they were not entitled to at all."

At present they were being compensated on the basis of ten years' purchase, or a fifteen years' run. If they introduced a twenty-one years' time-limit the first effect would be to give a compensation not on ten years' purchase, but on fifteen years' purchase—that was, not on the basis of a fourteen years' run, but on a twenty-one years' run; thus they would raise the whole standard of compensation by 50 per cent., and pro tanto they would have to raise the compensation levy, or else they would lower the rate of reduction in the number of licences. That was a very serious point to be borne in mind. Though this question was not raised by this particular point, it had often been suggested that the reduction period should take place after fourteen years, and that then there should be a close time. That would have a very pernicious effect from the point of view of temperance reform. That close time, during which there would be entire security to the trader, was, he felt convinced, a time which would mean deterioration of the conduct of the trade, because the greater the security of the trade, the worse had always been its conduct. All the facts were in favour of that. The Leader of the Opposition had, as one of his most cherished illusions, the doctrine that they must give security to the trade so that the conduct of the trade should be satisfactory. The history of the beer-houses, which had absolute security of tenure, when the brewers, if they had chosen, could have introduced the Continental café system, showed that that time was one of growing demoralisation, a time when things went backward in England, and it was not until control was re-established by the Government of 1869 and 1872 that they turned the corner and made progress. He looked with great suspicion and distrust upon this proposal for a seven years close time. So far from it being a shock to public opinion in the country, he had found it exceedingly difficult to defend the length of the time allowed in the Bill. Might he remind the Committee what the precedents were. Take the case of the Church of England Temperance Society, which had a Bill in 1893, backed by the Bishop of Manchester, imposing a five years time-limit. Cardinal Vaughan in 1891 advocated a five years time-limit.

MR. JAMES HOPE: Were they to pay a levy all the time for compensation of others?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said they undoubtedly were, except in the case of the Manchester Bill in 1891, under which the proposal was that the total reduction, which was more drastic than that proposed under this Bill, was to take place in the first year. The time-limit originated in the Church of England Temperance Bill, and their representatives before Lord Peel's Licensing Commission, including the Member for North-West Manchester, justified it. The Archbishop of Canterbury's proposal in 1904 for twenty-one years was made only after proposals for a time-limit of seven and fourteen years had been rejected in the Commons. It was proposed, as a last desperate expedient, to get a compromise of some sort into the Bill. He wanted to lay stress on the fact that this proposal was a far more generous one than had been made in any of our Colonies. There had been terms of fourteen years in South Australia and ten years in Victoria, but those were in commutation of a definite statutory right of renewal, and not in commutation of an indefinite expectation of renewal. In Canada and in the United States they had never given a particle of compensation or a month of time-limit. But his main objection to this extended time-limit was owing to its effect on temperance reform. They were asked: Why not make a concession? His answer was because it involved a postponement of all the most important temperance reforms to which they attached importance. Mr. Gladstone's statement had been quoted that he thought the reduction of public-houses, as a remedy, was an imposture. Both his actions and his speeches showed that he said that because he believed the reduction of licences would be of lesser value unless they wound up the monopoly at the same time, Mr. Gladstone said in 1880—

“At the present, the number of public-houses is enormous. Yes, Sir, but something else ought to be taken into consideration. Why is it that the position of public-houses in this country is lower than it is in any country in Europe? That is the result of the management we have followed, and the number does not in the slightest degree tend to mitigate that statement. I am one of those who see the almost incurable, radical and profound mischief from what is called the publicans' monopoly, and not through any fault of the publican or indeed of anyone. My firm belief is that as long as the monopoly connected with private interests belongs to the trade, you will never have true and efficient police supervision exercised over the public-houses, and without that they must continue to hold the disparaged and unsatisfactory position which they do hold now and have held for many generations.”

They had waited long enough for real temperance reform in England. Everyone admitted the urgent character of the evils. The Leader of the Opposition had told them they were in the presence of the great and ever-present tragedy of drink, and had spoken on several occasions of the immense importance of grappling with the problem, but no one had done more than the right hon. Gentleman to rivet upon the country and to perpetuate that tragedy of drink which he deplored. It was because in this Amendment they were asked to wait for an additional seven years that he implored the Government not to make any concession in this matter. He wished to register his emphatic protest against the lengthening of the time, and to protest against the excessive and inordinate postponement of the day of deliverance which had been too long already delayed.

*MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said that many parts of the speech of the hon. Gentleman had caused him surprise, but certainly those observations which he made as to the part which the Leader of the Opposition had played in the history of licensing reform in this country caused him the greatest degree of astonishment. As to his statement that his right hon. friend had riveted the drink trade more firmly upon the people of this country than it had ever been riveted before—he (Mr. Smith) asked himself what importance it deserved, and in order to answer that question, he recalled for a moment some further observations and predictions that were indulged in by the hon. Gentleman and his political friends at the time his right hon. friend introduced the Bill which it was said had riveted the trade on the people of the country. It was stated freely by every opponent of the Bill that it would have no effect whatever in the reduction of licensing, and that it would endow the brewing trade. The Prime Minister said—

"I predict that this Bill will have no effect in reducing the number of licences, and it will endow the brewers of the country."

Was there any Member of that Party who would by reasoned argument repeat those statements? None; and he dismissed the hon. Gentleman's observations on the Bill of his right hon. friend with the remark that there had been no Bill which had done more for temperance reform if the view of hon. Gentlemen opposite that reduction of licences promoted sobriety was the true one. As to its truth he expressed no opinion, but if indeed that was the fact and it was worth while causing great proprietary disturbance in order that they might reduce the number of premises on which alcoholic drink could be obtained, then beyond controversy that Act which the hon. Gentleman stigmatised as having riveted the drink trade upon the people of the country must be pronounced to have been more successful than any of its predecessors. He did not in the least complain of the hon. Gentleman saying that any calculations or any argument which he had addressed to the House had no value at all. It was entirely a matter for the opinion of the Committee or ultimately perhaps of the country, but he thought he had some grievance against the hon. Member when he repeatedly stated that on the First Reading he had promised to give something to the House which he had never given it, and that he had been guilty of a breach of faith. The only method of determining whether or not anything which he had omitted to do constituted a breach of faith, was to consider what he had said on the First Reading, which he should imagine the hon. Gentleman had never done. What he said was—

"This statement that I have deals with fifteen representative companies, and I am quite prepared to give privately to any hon. Member the names of the companies and the figures and calculations which I now offer to the House."

He asked the Committee to note carefully the scope of the undertaking which he gave. It might have been that it would be a more useful method of checking the figures which he laid before the House, if he had been able to make a more extended undertaking. In fact those who had given the figures had authorised him to make the undertaking which he had just read out, and he made no other simply because he was not authorised to make any other. The reason he offered to give the figures and calculations was because he realised the unreasonableness of asking the House to recollect figures which occupied about a column of Hansard and which no one could intelligently follow as hurriedly stated in debate. The hon. Gentleman thought it proper to write to the provincial Press, and he (Mr. Smith) only saw the hon. Gentleman's lucubrations by accident. He had totally failed to establish that he had been guilty of a breach of faith. The truth was, of course, that it would have assisted the hon. Member if he had given him access—which he was in no position to do—to the books of every company he had mentioned. That entitled no opponent to state in the House or out of it that he (Mr. Smith) had been guilty of a breach of faith or that the calculations which he had put forward did not possess the value and the importance which he attributed to them.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said he thought the hon. Gentleman had not been quite frank with the House. The matter was a small one, but his complaint was that the figures had been left for months with the impression produced upon everybody that he had had the means of checking them, and was utterly unable to make any reply. He was entirely justified in saying that he was not given—it was not the fault of the hon. Member, but of the companies—the kind of figures in this matter which would be required in any compensation Court and which were necessary to form a real judgment on these calculations.

MR. F. E. SMITH said he did not wish to pursue this controversy, but he did not think the Committee would deny a few moments explanation to an hon. Member to answer a charge of being guilty of want of frankness. It could not be shown that he had been guilty of a breach of faith, because he had never promised the figures to the House. He desired to make one or two observations as to cases in which the hon. Member had been offered the fullest opportunity of testing the calculations offered to the Committee. The hon. Member was familiar with the offer made in the Press by one company that any expert appointed by the hon. Member would be allowed to test by actuarial calculations whether it was possible at the end of fourteen or twenty-one years time-limit for them to make good the losses caused by this Bill. A similar offer was made by Mr. Buxton, but no one had accepted the challenge. Personally he should not vote upon the particular proposal that was before the House, for the reason that to his mind the distinction between a fourteen and a twenty-one years time-limit was utterly immaterial. It was only material in the sense that to some extent it qualified the injustice, which remained an injustice, whether the period decided upon was fourteen or twenty-one years. They fastened upon one principle in dealing with the question of compensation which they said licensed victuallers were entitled to, and that principle was that, if they took away for public purposes what licensed victuallers enjoyed to-day, they should give the market value for it. When he said the market value, he did not mean the freehold value. Nobody ever had contended that they were entitled to the freehold value. The contention that had been successfully put and supported in the Courts was that a licence at the present day, and had for many years past, carried with it an expectation which was so definite in its character, and in the average of cases extended over so protracted a period, that it was of very considerable value indeed. Their position was that if they were going to take that away for public purposes, the measure of their liability was that they should pay that market value which they would have to pay if that value was local and not national in character. All that Sharpe v. Wakefield did was to say that the magistrates might take away a licence after a particular consideration of the individual case of an individual house. It never said that they might take away licences wholesale; in fact, the then Lord Chancellor most carefully excluded himself from that construction of his words by saying that they were not to be taken generally, but after an examination of the facts of a particular case.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. and learned Member is entering into a discussion of the general question. The Amendment deals only with the duration of the time-limit, the Committee having already, on the Amendment to leave out subsection (1), determined the principle of a time-limit.

MR. F. E. SMITH said that when the hon. Member for Marylebone advanced this very argument on the last Amendment the Chairman said it would be in order on this Amendment.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I must deal with the matter as it comes before me. The observations of the hon. and learned Member clearly relate to the general question which has already been decided rather than to the subject matter of the Amendment.

EARL WINTERTON said that when the Chairman was in the Chair he led the Committee to understand that on this Amendment it would be possible to have a general discussion of this point.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I was in the House at the time, and there is nothing in my ruling which is inconsistent with what the Chairman said.

MR. F. E. SMITH asked how far any of the calculations hitherto addressed to the Committee had satisfied them that there would be no loss to any of the shareholders whose affairs had been described. He was prepared to accept the three published statements put forward. First of all there was the list of Sir William Dupree, in regard to which the hon. Member opposite had stated that he could not accept the specific statement of fact he had made. If they were going to deal with the statement of a man so highly respected in the commercial world as Sir William Dupree in that summary manner, there would be no difficulty in disposing of any objections. In the cases he had cited, was it contended that ordinary shareholders, under the fourteen years time-limit, would be able to protect themselves, under any circumstances, against loss? Was there anybody who could produce the affairs of any company which would show that in any case the ordinary shareholders would be able to recoup themselves in fourteen years? If that could not be done, then the Amendment must open up the broad question as between fourteen and twenty-one years, and as to what justification there was for interfering with the livelihood of persons who had invested their money in the way they had done under the law. No answer had been given to that—a matter for most serious consideration. Surely it was clear under these circumstances that no case had been made out for interfering by legislation wholly novel in its character with the savings of persons who had been encouraged for generations to make investments of this kind. While a limit of twenty-one as compared with fourteen years was undoubtedly more indulgent, it bore no relation at all to any compensation based on the principle of market value, and therefore was almost as unacceptable as the original proposal. No allowance of years that did not actuarially correspond to the market value of the licences would meet the legitimate expectations of those who had been encouraged by generations of legislation to make investments in licensed property.

\*MR. RIDSDALE (Brighton) said that in this matter it was necessary to view the trade as a whole and not the instances of particular licensed houses. They could not otherwise gauge accurately what the trade were going to suffer. In this case the position was that during the period of fourteen years the Bill provided that one-third of the trade was to be shut down without compensation. [Some cries of "With compensation."] No, it was without compensation, for the trade as a whole was to compensate part of itself. Out of some 97,000 licensed houses they were going to shut down 32,000, and the trade, as a whole, was not going to be compensated. What position was it in to put up a sinking fund in order to replace the loss that was going to accrue to it at the termination of the time-limit, whatever that time-limit might be? It was very difficult to ascertain exactly what was the sum that they had got to make provision for. They were going to have the monopoly value taken away from them at the end of that time. Nobody in the House and nobody outside the House was agreed exactly as to what this monopoly value was. Then they were going to have local option thrust upon them, so that those houses which would remain after they had compensated one-third of their number, the two-thirds, would be paying the compensation levy during this time, and would then have to face the question of the payment of the monopoly value, and also to face the absolutely indeterminate risk whether the country generally would adopt a scheme of local option and shut down their business altogether. Let them take the case of an ordinary brewery. He had looked through the list of breweries and they usually divided their capital into, say, one proportion of ordinary stock, one proportion of preference stock, and two proportions of debentures. Let them take a brewery company doing a fair business, earning, say, 5 per cent. on the whole of the capital involved in the business. What was the fair amount it should set aside out of its earnings in order to meet the contingencies imposed by this Bill? What amount could a trader afford to put by? If he put by a quarter of the whole of the money returned by his business he was putting by as much as he could reasonably be expected to do. If he did agree to put by 25 per cent. of the whole of the profits after paying the ordinary working expenses, how would that work out in the case he had just put before the House, where the ordinary capital was one quarter, the preference capital a quarter, and the debenture capital one half of the total capital of the company? The debentures were paying 4 per cent., and the preference shares 5 per cent. He had postulated the concern as earning 5 per cent. on the whole of the capital, and to provide a sinking fund to recoup some of the capital, and to meet some of these emergencies at the end of the time-limit, 25 per cent. of the whole profit was to be set aside. Therefore, an ordinary shareholder in a brewery of that description, who had been earning a dividend of 7 per cent. before this Act came into operation, would, after it had come into operation, have to accept a lower dividend. He was suggesting that 25 per cent. of the whole profit of the company should be set aside in order to make a sinking fund. How did that work out in figures? Twenty-five per cent. of the total profit meant that the ordinary shareholder would have to put by 5 per cent. and reduce his dividend from 7 per cent. to 2 per cent. That was a very severe drop for him; but if he agreed to put it by, what proportion of the capital would be returned in fourteen years at compound interest at 4 per cent., or in twenty-one years at compound interest at 4 per cent? The 5 per cent. on the ordinary shares, or 25 per cent. of the total profits, was equivalent to 1½ per cent. on the whole of the capital in the business, and 1½ per cent. at 4 per cent. compound interest for fourteen years would replace 23 per cent. of the capital, and 1½ per cent. at 4 per cent. compound interest in twenty-one years would replace 40 per cent. He respectfully submitted to the temperance advocates in the House that the risks involved in local option at the end of the period—the claim to the monopoly value on behalf of the State and the compensation levy which the people would have to pay during the fourteen years—were not over-compensated by their being allowed to have 40 per cent. in cash put by, and the freehold property in their brewery remaining. He thought twenty-one years might about give them the opportunity to turn round and put themselves in a fair position. He was perfectly clear that fourteen years did not do so, and that the accumulation of 23 per cent. which would be provided by the sinking fund would be a perfectly inadequate provision to meet the emergencies of the situation. He believed it always had been the practice in the past, when it had been found necessary to do anything for the good of the community against the interests of part of the community, to compensate that part generously. In this particular instance they could afford to be generous, even the most extreme temperance Member. For the time-limit was not a temperance matter in any appreciable degree at all. He agreed that the reduction period was a temperance matter, because there they had to determine in what period a certain number of houses had to be done away with. But they must not confuse the reduction period and the time-limit. The two matters were distinct, and this time-limit was a matter more for financial experts than for temperance reformers. He noticed with regret that a great many of his hon. friends with a keen interest in temperance would press for a short time-limit rather than for temperance reforms. Let them take the case of a brewery earning rather more than the 5 per cent. on the whole of its capital. Take a case, in which a brewery earned 7 per cent. on the whole of its capital. That capital was divided as before into one-fourth ordinary, one-fourth preference, and two quarters debentures, the debentures bearing interest at 4 per cent. and the preference shares 5 per cent. In that case the ordinary shares would be getting 15 per cent. Twenty-five per cent. of its whole profits, if put by, would produce a sinking fund of the amount of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the whole capital of the company. If they applied that to a sinking fund of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent at 4 per cent. compound interest during fourteen years it would recoup 32 per cent. of the capital, a far better return than in the first case. But this  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the whole capital must come from the ordinary shareholders. The consent of the ordinary shareholders to provide the sinking fund would be required. What sort of sacrifice had they to make to produce this 32 per cent.? This  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. sinking fund represented 7 per cent. on the ordinary capital, and meant a reduction of the ordinary shareholders' dividend from 15 per cent. to 8 per cent. If they were asked to reduce it they might say: "Oh, no! The directors are appointed by us, the ordinary shareholders, why should we pay this 7 per cent.? If we pay it for the whole of the fourteen years it means 98 per cent. of our capital without added interest and all to replace 32 per cent. of a capital on which the preference holders and debenture holders have a prior claim." They would say: "We will take what we can while we can, and the preference shareholders and the debenture holders can go whistle." That was a situation he did not want to see come about. That was a situation which, if they extended this time-limit, would not come, because they would not allow the incidence of the sinking fund to fall that the ordinary shareholder need not feel it. He suggested that they should put in a period of seven years between the fourteen years reduction period and the period in which the time-limit should become operative. He was sorry that the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Hackney obtained precedence on the Paper, for although it effected a great deal of good there were one or two points it omitted. It did not make any provision for telling the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount he would come into when the whole monopoly value suddenly devolved upon him. That it would be a large sum they all believed. What it would be he had no information upon himself, and he very much doubted if anybody had. He thought it would have been far better if the hon. Member's Amendment had incorporated a means by which the Treasury would have felt their way gradually as to what the sum might be. It also rather left the trade to face a sudden situation and an enormous claim upon them without themselves being able to adjust the way in which they were to meet the burden imposed. But even if they could not get a graduated scheme he trusted that the general principle of the Amendment would be accepted by the Government and that the trade, after paying compensation levy for fourteen years and being on the rack for that time, might have a certain time in which to say their prayers.

EARL WINTERTON said the hon. Member for Brighton did well to call the attention of his friends who represented the temperance interest to the fact that this Amendment raised hard and dry financial facts, and that it was not possible to discuss it from the point of view of the hon. Member for Lincoln. The hon. Member for Lincoln, and the Prime Minister, speaking on another Amendment, seemed to assume that there was some justification for the proposal of the Government in the precedents to be found in other countries. It had been stated that in America licences had been taken away without notice or compensation. He was anxious to challenge hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite on that particular point. He ventured to lay down that there had never been in any country put into legislative operation any system such as that suggested by the present subsection. It was quite impossible under any circumstances to compare the state of things in the United States of America with the situation which had arisen here. In the first place, as hon. Members knew, in the United States nothing like the same value attached to licences as in this country. Neither was there anything like the same expectation of continuity. What had been the result where licences had been taken away? In Colorado, for instance, the people who sold liquor before with a licence now sold it without a licence. [Cries of dissent.] If hon. Members would look into the United States Federal Government statistics they would find that there was not a State in the Union where there had not been as much liquor sold without as with licences. He challenged any hon. Member to show any instance in European countries of any proposals being passed at all equal to the proposals in that Bill.

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): Norway and Sweden are European countries.

EARL WINTERTON: Neither had any connection whatever with this proposal. The liquor traffic there was on an entirely different basis. The hon. Gentleman could not have chosen a worse example. Norway and Sweden were the most drunken countries in Europe.

*MR. LEIF JONES: They were the most drunken countries in Europe, but they got legislation somewhat on the lines of the Government proposals and they are now the most sober countries in Europe.

EARL WINTERTON: The hon. Gentleman surely did not want them to believe that what the Government was proposing was the Gothenburg system. He regretted that in the heat of the moment he used what might seem an opprobrious term in regard to Norway and Sweden, but he still said that there was a regrettable amount of drunkenness in those countries. Neither of those countries could be taken as a good example of any system of temperance. The Government had not put forward any reason for proposing the adoption of the system in this country on the ground of popular sanction. The principle suggested in the subsection would never be tolerated by the people of this country. If the country had known at the last election that this was to be the great legislative effort of the present Government when they got into office, he did not believe that the constituencies would have endorsed it. [An Hon. Member said it was announced.] In some isolated cases they might have done so. No doubt the people were led away by vague talk, but they were not aware of the wholesale drastic financial attacks on the trade made by this Bill. Before the Committee came to a decision on this subsection the Government ought to give some justification for adopting the altogether novel system which they proposed. As his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, the objection of the Opposition was based, not only on the number of years, but on the whole system which they believed to be unjust. While he would vote against the fourteen years time-limit proposed by the Government he could not support the proposal of the hon. Member for South Hackney.

*SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham) supported the Amendment. Every one of the speeches had been an attack on the principle of the time-limit. It seemed to him that there were three schools of opinion on this subject in the House. There was the school represented by the Opposition; the school represented by his hon. friend who spoke strongly in favour of the fourteen years limit; and the school, with which he desired to associate himself, which believed that while a fourteen years limit would be totally inequitable, a twenty-one years limit would be fair and equitable. He had an Amendment on the Paper which was practically identical with that before the Committee. The Amendment was not his own, but was moved in another place in 1904 by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Bill of that year. The Amendment was supported then by practically the whole bench of Bishops, by the whole of the Liberal Party in the House of Lords, and by a fair sprinkling of Unionist Peers. His Amendment would not disturb in any way the period for the reduction of superfluous houses; and, therefore, all those who desired to see the reduction of these superfluous houses within the prescribed time would be able to realise that desire if his Amendment were adopted. It added to the fourteen years reduction period seven years during which a lease should be granted to the surviving houses, and during which period these houses should be exempted from any charge for monopoly value. He thought that the more closely a proposal like his was looked into, the more the trade would see what an advantageous proposal it was in their interests. It might be assumed that before the end of the fourteen years all the redundant houses would be extinguished, and that all those who had survived "the reign of terror" would enjoy an additional profit to that which had previously attached to their houses. He believed that it had been estimated that from 40 to 45 per cent. of the profits of the houses which would be extinguished would find its way into the tills of the surviving houses. He would point out that the surviving houses would be able to conduct their business on a better administrative basis. This proposal, therefore, offered a really fair chance to the trade to readjust its arrangements to the circumstances during the protracted reduction period; and enable them to lay by a sufficient sum of money to meet the necessary liabilities at the end of twenty-one years. Undoubtedly fourteen years would be an extremely short period for accomplishing the double object of finding compensation for the houses extinguished, and providing an insurance against the liability of those houses which survived that process to be extinguished at the expiration of the period. Those two operations being combined during that short period of fourteen years, so far as he could gather from the figures he had obtained, the trade would be put into a very precarious position. Let him give an instance which showed what the difference would be between fourteen years and twenty-one years. He knew of a brewery company which held twenty-one licences. The capital value of these licences, apart from buildings, was £550,000. The net annual profits amounted to £46,160. Allowing £5 a week for remuneration of each licence-holder would give £4,460. Then there would be £40,700 available for interest and sinking fund. Fourteen annual payments to receive £100 at the end of the period would amount to £5 3s. 9d., whereas, if the calculation were extended over a period of twenty-one years it would be £3 7s. 9d. Therefore, it would be seen that the sinking fund required in fourteen years would be £31,280, leaving only £9,420 available for dividend, which came out at 1½ per cent.; whilst the sinking fund over a period of twenty-one years would be £18,630, leaving for dividend £22,070, which would be equal to 4 per cent. fully. He would give another instance of how severe the treatment would be at the end of the fourteen years' limit. In 1904 the Central Public House Trust Association bought the "Bell Inn" at Kennington. They gave for it £2,200, a perfectly good business transaction as things then stood. The licence value was estimated at £1,850. That was the sum to be wiped out in the course of fourteen years; to do it, they must put aside yearly out of net profits a sum of £125. Now, calculating their net profits at £180, the Association was left with the small sum of £55 for dividend purposes, which on the present share capital would only amount to 1 per cent. If the period was extended to twenty-one years, the Association would be able to pay interest of 4 per cent. to their shareholders. It was impossible to go closely into all the financial intricacies of this very difficult problem; but he was satisfied from all the information he had been able to gather on the question, that an extension of the period from fourteen years to twenty-one years would remove all ground for the allegations of harsh treatment brought against the time-limit system by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Let him make one more point. When dealing with cases like this it had been the immemorial practice of the State to treat a trade affected by any legislative reform in a generous manner. He did not intend to quibble about whether a licence was for a year or not. By practice it had been always a good deal more. Whilst they on that side of the House were anxious to resume to the State the full control of these licences they desired to do it in a just and fair manner. He would give an instance of what he meant. Some years ago the London County Council undertook, under the Housing Act, the Boundary Street clearance scheme at a cost to the ratepayers, not the owners of property, of £270,000, including compensation to all the trade interests in the area dealt with. What he asked for was that the Government should mete out similar justice to the trade affected by the proposals of this Bill. He thought it was the general opinion that if ever this Bill became an Act of Parliament it must contain an extended time-limit period beyond fourteen years. He wanted to see that done in this House. He did not want to see any opportunity given in another place to reject this measure, and certainly he did not want to see an opportunity given to hon. Members opposite of saying that the people of the country had to look to the other House as the custodian of equity and justice. While it might be regarded as a tactical point for the Government to make this concession at a later stage of the Bill, he hoped they would make it now. He knew that he voiced the opinion of many hon. Members when he expressed the sincere hope that the Government and his right hon. friend the Prime Minister would give a careful and earnest consideration to the proposal now before the House, especially when they realised that if this measure was to become an Act of Parliament and a true temperance reform they must treat the trade concerned with greater justice.

MR. BARNES (Glasgow, Blackfriars) said he wished to express the view of his colleagues with regard to this particular Amendment; but before doing so he desired to say a word with reference to the speech of the noble Lord, the Member for the Horsham division of Sussex, who had said that Norway and Sweden were the most drunken countries in Europe. He did not know whether anybody else had used the expression that they were the most drunken countries in the world.

EARL WINTERTON: I expressly said that they were the two most drunken nations in Europe, and that statistics proved it.

MR. BARNES said he had had the opportunity of studying the position on the spot in Norway and Sweden. He knew that those countries had adopted legislation not of the character of the measure before the House, but legislation suited to their own conditions and habits, as they were entitled to do. He knew, as a matter of fact, and he had gone into the figures very carefully, that though it was quite true the consumption of alcoholic liquor was still very high in these countries, so far as the liquors coming under the operation of their temperance legislation were concerned, there had been a diminution of the consumption of just about one-half.

EARL WINTERTON said that even now the latest statistics showed that in Christiania the arrests for drunkenness per 1,000 of the population were forty-three, in London ten, in Liverpool, eleven, in Manchester, thirteen, and in Glasgow, eighteen.

MR. BARNES said he had it in his mind that these figures had absolutely no bearing upon the question before the Committee nor on any question of temperance legislation at all. They might have something to do with the police regulations in Christiania and other cities. However, he would not say anything more on that point. What he wanted to state on behalf of his colleagues of the Labour Party was that they felt very strongly on this question of the time-limit, and that they hoped whatever fate was to befall this Bill, it would not be weakened as regarded the time-limit. The Labour Party, having regard to all the notice which had been given to the trade in various temperance legislation proposals for a generation past, and having regard to the fact that time-limits of a much smaller number of years than fourteen had been proposed even from the benches above the gangway—from five years upwards—thought that fourteen years was not only a just but a generous proposal. He did not want to go into the percentages which had been quoted by various hon. Members, but he thought that the House ought to back up the Government in limiting the period to fourteen years and leave it to the other place to deal with it as they thought proper.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): The Committee discussed and decided yesterday the question whether a time-limit—not a time-limit in terms—should form a part of the scheme of this Bill, and, by an overwhelming majority, they answered the question in the affirmative. We are to-day on a different point—a point not of principle, but rather of machinery, namely, assuming that there is to be a time-limit, what the duration of the limit ought in fairness and equity to be. Now it is quite obvious from the course the debate has taken that on that point the Committee is divided into two entirely hostile and irreconcilable camps. There are those who voted yesterday against any time-limit at all, on the ground that, given the scheme of this Bill, it would be impossible for any time-limit to be reconciled by its machinery with the ordinary dictates of justice and fair play. That is the position of the Leader of the Opposition and practically of all those who support him. We have had to-day declarations from the other side of the House—those of the Member for Liverpool and the noble Lord—which are perfectly consistent with the position they took up yesterday. On the other hand, there are to be found the great majority of the representatives in Parliament who are in favour of a time-limit and the resumption by the State of the property which it ought to have, but there is a difference of opinion as to what the precise duration of the time-limit should be. I ventured when I introduced this Bill at the end of last February to lay down on behalf of the Government what appeared to us to be the governing principle in this matter. I said—

“Your time-limit should be as long as, and not longer than, the time that shall suffice for a prudent trader who has carried on, and is carrying on, his business with due regard to its special character and peculiar risks, to make adequate provision against the disappearance of that part of his property which is to be attributed to the monopoly value.”

That is I think a perfectly sound principle which the hon. Member has not attempted to controvert. All he has said is that twenty-one years would be more reasonable than fourteen. Now, Sir, I have listened to these debates and have been reading during the last six months vast quantities of literature directed to the point that the term of fourteen years proposed by the Government is an inadequate term. The Government have always preserved a perfectly open mind upon this, which is not a matter of principle, but of detail. I have given the most impartial attention to the arguments, and am bound to say, speaking with full responsibility, that nothing that has been said or put forward has satisfied me that the term of fourteen years is otherwise than a just and a fair one. Let me point out, in parenthesis, that there is no necessary, and indeed no logical connection between the term of fourteen years which the House has already adopted in the first clause as the term during which the compulsory and statutory reduction is to take place, and the term, whatever it may be, which is selected for what we call the time-limit, meaning thereby the period at the end of which the State will resume the monopoly value of all licences, there is no necessary connection between the two things. But after careful examination, we came to the conclusion that the trader who had conducted, and continued to conduct, his business on the lines I have laid down might and ought to be able to make provision for the redemption of that part, and that part only, of his property which is the monopoly value within fourteen, or rather fifteen years from the introduction of the Bill. As I have said, I have not only listened to what has been said here every day, but I have read a great deal of what has been said outside. I find it comes down to particular cases like that of the “Coach and Horses,” which, I think, foundered long ago in an argumentative morass [OPPOSITION cries of “Oh, no”]—well, they have been flogged into activity again during the last two days, but I think they still present a very sorry spectacle. After all, the “Coach and Horses,” so far as I know anything of the case, was one of the clearest cases, if ever there was one, in which a man entered into a speculation with his eyes open. Everybody knew, in the spring or summer of 1907, when the contract was entered into for the purchase of the “Coach and Horses,” not only from the result of the general election more than a year before, but from repeated declarations by responsible Ministers, that legislation on the lines of this Bill was impending. It is, therefore, ridiculous to say that the purchaser, a shrewd man of business—I gather from his observations a very shrewd man of business—has any ground of complaint whatever if Parliament chooses, in the public interest, to legislate on the lines of the present Bill. I am not going to detain the House by entering into specific cases like that of the "Coach and Horses." But I will just mention one or two points which seem to me not to have had sufficient attention or weight given to them in the debate. The allegation that a trader carrying on his business on the lines and in the spirit indicated in the passage I have referred to could not make good the monopoly value within the term prescribed by the Bill seems to rest upon two assumptions, neither of which is well founded. The first assumption is, I find this perpetually in all the literature circulated by the trade, that the monopoly value of licensed premises represents something—I see the proportions differently stated at different times and places, but something which varies from two-thirds to three-fourths, and even nine-tenths, of the total value of the premises. I do not believe that there is the least foundation for the assumption. I think that it is a gross exaggeration. I will give the Committee the summarised totals of the dealings of the Board of Inland Revenue with the houses that in fact have been suppressed under the right hon. Gentleman's legislation in 1905 and 1906. There are 500 houses, and the total Schedule A value of these houses with their licence is £13,952. The total present Schedule A value without a licence is £9,540. In other words, the value of the houses without a licence as compared with their value with a licence is 68 per cent. of the total. If those cases are anything like typical, it shows how gross is the assumption that a licence adds three or four times to the value of the premises. I agree that there is some criticism to be made on these figures if you are to take them as being typical. In the first place, some of those houses were of a lower class. There is the ante-1869 beer-house whose vitality some hon. Gentlemen are so anxious to preserve, and it is true that in some of the houses, owing to density of population and other causes, the monopoly value is less than in other parts of the community. But when you have made the fullest allowance, there is still an enormous margin, which goes to disprove the suggestion that the monopoly value created by the possession of a licence is anything like the figure which the trade and others constantly represent it to be. Another point which is equally important and upon which not sufficient stress has been laid in the course of the debates is that owing to the state of the law, well known now certainly for the last twenty years, provided against by insurance and otherwise, and taken into account by all persons engaged in this industry who survey the situation around them, it has been possible to build up, and there has been built up, enormous reserve funds to preserve them against this contingency. The Under-Secretary for the Home Department, in a speech on the First Reading, made a careful analysis and gave figures to show that these funds, even leaving out of account Guinness', amounted to £11,000,000 sterling, and if the other members of the trade pursue the course which was so widely and prudently taken, and which they might themselves have taken had they had the same insight into the circumstances of the case, I do not believe that there will be the least practical difficulty on an average in having sufficient funds provided for a contingency in respect of the extinction of the monopoly value at the end of the time-limit. Taking all these things into account, I must say that speaking for myself and for my colleagues, we do not think that the term of fourteen years, or rather fifteen years, in the Bill can be said to be in any way unjust. We certainly cannot accept the Amendment which has been brought forward now by the hon. Member for Hackney. If you continue the compensation levy for seven years beyond the fourteen years, you prevent the possibility during that time of the free exercise by the justices of their discretion and you delay the whole settlement of this question for twenty-one years. No; if there is to be anything in the nature of a compromise on this point it must not proceed on these lines. I will state exactly the conditions of what I conceive the problem to be. By the first clause of the Bill a compulsory statutory reduction must take place within the next fourteen years. During these fourteen years compensation will continue to be levied from the survivors among the licence-holders. At the end of fourteen years it is our intention that the compensation levy should cease and that the magistrates should resume the control

which they used to possess, and which they ought to possess—a free and unrestricted control over the grant of licences in their district. In addition to that we have by the provision which we propose to insert in the second subsection of the clause reserved to the inhabitants of the locality by an adequate and not excessive majority the power of dealing with the question as far as their own community is concerned. Given those conditions, which the Government regard as fundamental, I am prepared to entertain the suggestion that for a short term of years following the expiration of fourteen years when an old licence is re-granted it should be re-granted without attaching to the re-grant as a condition the surrender of its monopoly value—in other words, to postpone the resumption by the State of the monopoly value of the surviving houses until the expiration of that additional term. That is in accordance with the principle of the Bill, because at the expiration of fourteen years it gives to the justices and to the community the absolute power over the licences which are to be granted or are not to be granted in the locality, but, on the other hand, it may have the effect in exceptional cases of hardship, of postponing the date at which the State would resume the actual possession, and it may have the effect of softening the operation and preventing any possibility—I will not say of unjust, but of inconsiderate treatment. I am not proposing to introduce any Amendment at this stage, but I throw out that suggestion to the House for consideration between now and the Report Stage of the Bill. It will not placate, and it is not intended to placate the opposition of those who are opposed to the principle of this Bill. Those who are opposing the measure would not take twenty-one years as the time-limit; neither would they take a forty years time-limit nor any other time-limit. It is with no desire or expectation of what I may call buying off the hostility of the root and branch opponents of the Bill that I throw out the suggestion. It is made with the object of satisfying even the most meticulous—no, I will not say that, but the most fastidious scruples of any one who feels that injustice in any particular case may be done to individuals. It is made in order to meet these scruples, to satisfy every reasonable man who accepts the principle of a State-created monopoly to which the State is entitled and which it is bound to resume. It is to satisfy the scruples of those who hold the view that any possible case of hardship or grievance can be made out, without sacrificing in the least degree the fundamental principle of the Bill, which is that at the end of fourteen years every licence should be held at the uncontrolled and unfettered discretion of those who represent the community. It might be possible by this extension of date at which the monopoly value is in practice to be resumed, to cover all the possible cases of hardship which some hon. Members feel as being likely to occur. The suggestion is made in the interests of the Bill and of those who support its principle. But on the main question of the maintenance of fourteen years, which is the governing principle of the Bill, the Government is absolutely determined to adhere to the lines they have already followed and to ask the House to support them in rejecting the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): The right hon. Gentleman is correct when he says that we on this side of the House do not think it would be satisfying us to substitute twenty-one years for fourteen years, and even had he accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member he would not have placated those who oppose this Bill, among other reasons, because it is an unjust interference with legitimate rights. I do not now deal with that part of the right hon. Gentleman's argument in which he speaks of the immense reserve funds of the brewers as a sufficient ground for despoiling other parties of their property. I have no acquaintance with the management of these concerns, but I understand that these reserve funds were not accumulated in order to deal with predatory projects of legislation. They were accumulated as reserve funds to deal with the inevitable ups and downs incident to every species of trading; and the truth of what I have said may be found in the fact that Guinness has a large fund, though no licences. There is another curious fact to mention. I believe that a large amount of these reserve funds is invested in public-house property. Now if a reserve fund had been an accumulation to meet attacks on that kind of property it would not have been invested in that property. If I am right in that fact, it proves that the trade at all events never contemplated the species of legislation which the Government have now taken under their control or that it would be seriously pressed. I turn from the right hon. Gentleman's criticism on the management by brewers of their business to the actual proposal he has made. I am not quite sure that I apprehend the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, but I think his suggestion was this—that for fourteen years existing licence-holders should pay compensation out of their own pockets to those of their number who are going to be dispossessed during the fourteen years to come, and that then these licence-holders who have paid compensation for fourteen years are to be handed over to the discretion of the justices in the first place, and of the parish electors in the second place; and that, after that again, every licence-holder would continue in possession of the goodwill, of the improvements he had made in his house, and of the expectations of his licence, entirely at the discretion of not merely the justices acting upon the old principle, but of justices animated by the new principles with which the right hon. Gentleman is endeavouring to inoculate them, and at the unfettered discretion of a bare majority—or was it two-thirds—of the electors in each parish. I think that it is probably an extremely bad plan from the temperance point of view. I think you are going to ask a trade to be carried on under conditions under which no trade can be carried on, and the result will be that you will create injury to the cause you profess to serve. Those who do not want this accommodation provided the public, those who want all drinking suppressed are no doubt quite right in doing what they can to increase the abuses. But I hold, and I believe the majority of the House hold, I am certain the majority of the country hold, that you not only must, but ought to give legitimate opportunities to the poor public as you must continue to give them to the rich public, of obtaining alcohol. If you are going to give those facilities—if you admit the necessity—in Heaven's name see that the trade by which that necessity is to be met is carried on under conditions which will give you men of credit and character to conduct it, and will enable this consumption of alcohol to be carried on under conditions which will not produce vice and excess, and not lead to the intolerable evils under which we groan, but which will, so far as legislation can, enable the public to be served in a manner best calculated to produce moderation in the use of alcohol and diminish crimes which so often follow upon excessive indulgence. Is it not clear that the new plan of the Government is not temperance reform, whatever else it is? Is it a concession to the justices? It is no concession to the justices. Under the old system the magistrates abolished some perfectly insignificant number of public-houses, because they felt it was most abominable treatment for men investing their money to be deprived without compensation. You are going to put magistrates in the old position—are the magistrates in fourteen years going to exercise their discretion in the old manner? If they do, I think it will introduce a great deal of that insecurity that existed before 1904, and all the evils consequent upon insecurity in the management. You are going back to that state of things—an utterly bad and rotten state of things—and to argument its evils by supplementing the action of the magistrates by the action of the parishes. I think it is absurd to say that a plan of that kind is temperance reform. Is it not equally absurd to say that it makes this Bill a juster Bill than at present? I think that to ask people for fourteen or fifteen years to pay compensation for the abolition of licences and then to throw the remaining licences to the wolves—

AN HON. MEMBER: Who are the wolves?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The temperance faddists. You talk of the evils of the intervention of the publican in politics, local and Imperial; just conceive what the intervention of the publican must be after the fourteen or fifteen years. He knows that at any moment a hostile majority in the parish may deprive him of his whole means of livelihood. Why, his life will be spent in canvassing, and in doing all that his ingenuity and his powers of management of men may enable him to do to collect a sufficient party in his parish to see that his property will not be interfered with.

And you call that legitimate security—you call that treating these men in a spirit which is likely to make them good servants of the public and to prevent them interfering unduly in their own personal interests with the management of public affairs. It is characteristic of the method in which we are asked to discuss the Bill that the Government have given us no notice of the method in which they are going to deal with this difficulty. They have adopted neither a modification nor an extension of the old scheme; but a new scheme carrying with it large possibilities which we have only had time to think of while the right hon. Gentleman was speaking. I do not contradict the Prime Minister when he says it is consistent with the Bill, but I do say it is not a modification of the Bill. It is a new scheme which requires much more study than the House can give to it. The Government have known it for months past. They have deliberately compelled us to discuss this Bill under the threat of the closure, and, knowing that we could not protest, they have deliberately abstained from giving us either the smallest notice of what their new plans are or the slightest opportunity of discussing them. Of all the travesties of Parliamentary procedure surely the greatest is this—that exactly sixty minutes before the guillotine falls upon this subsection we should be asked to decide upon two enormous questions neither of which the House has ever had the opportunity of discussing on any occasion; one, the entirely new plan for dealing with the fifteen years period and the other the question of the off-licences. Could there be anything more preposterous, and would any Government in the world that had not brand hand and foot the Assembly with which they were dealing treat that Assembly in that way? Whether I consider the substance of the right hon. Gentleman's plan, or the form in which he has proposed it, or the general manner in which he has treated this House, his action seems to me to be equally open to our condemnation and that condemnation we shall give—in the only manner permitted by the rules under which we are working—in the lobby.

*MR. LEIF JONES said he had listened with grave concern and anxiety to the most important announcement which the Prime Minister had made to the Committee that afternoon. The right hon. Gentleman showed in the course of his speech that the fourteen years time limit was ample for the purpose for which it was intended. He rightly said that none of the opponents of the Bill had been able to prove that injustice would be done to the trade by the fourteen years notice. He (Mr. Leif Jones) thought that never had a proposal emerged more unscathed from a long discussion. There had been plenty of general statements about hardship, but when details were asked for they were not forthcoming. Therefore he regretted that the Prime Minister had felt it necessary to offer more than the too generous terms which were offered in this clause. He rightly said it would not placate the Opposition, and the tone of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition was sufficient evidence that his foresight in that matter was absolutely accurate. The real issue was between those who wished the nation to control the trade and those who were not unwilling that the trade should control the nation. No concession that the Prime Minister could make would satisfy the grasping and greedy demand that the trade should be allowed to carry on its demoralising business undisturbed. The concession announced by the Prime Minister was a very large giving away of what he considered the nation's right to put reasonable taxation, taxation equivalent to the monopoly conferred, upon licences. The interesting speech they had had from the hon. Member for Huddersfield showed how little taxation was placed on licences in this country as compared with other countries, and yet to-day when the Prime Minister indicated a further period of seven years during which the nation should forego its right to extra taxation, there were renewed cries of dissatisfaction. If the Prime Minister's concession meant that after the expiration of the fourteen years limit the publicans were not to pay monopoly value for a further seven years, that would be a serious giving up of what he considered to be the nation's right to put on the licences taxation equivalent to the monopoly value conferred on them. He noticed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present when the Prime Minister made the announcement, but he would be very curious to know, if with ease he had been induced to consent to so liberal a foregoing of money which he might reasonably have expected to have at his disposal. Let them look at the position the trade would be in at the end of the reduction period. As he understood it, at the end of that period there would be no compensation levy, and they would be free from having to pay any portion of the monopoly value during the seven years suggested, so that they would be in a far better position than at the present time.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall): And they will receive no compensation either.

*MR. LEIF JONES said that at any rate there was to be no new burden for seven years. No doubt they would be exposed to certain risks to which they were not exposed at the present time, as the magisterial discretion was to be restored and the temperance provisions of the Bill to come into operation. It was to those temperance provisions that many hon. Members on that side of the House attached the greatest importance. He himself had not ventured into the financial discussion between experts on one side or the other; that was to him far and away the least important and interesting part of the question. It was for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those responsible for the finances of the nation to see that taxation was justly levied, and from all he could gather the trade was not justly taxed at the present time. But what he was most concerned about was to see that they should not have to wait longer than the fourteen years for the temperance reforms that were in the Bill. Very many important reforms were to come into operation at the end of fourteen years—magisterial discretion and the local option clauses, the latter of which had been described by the right hon. Gentleman, the Leader of the Opposition, as throwing the publicans to the wolves, the wolves being the voters in the village. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would live to repent that phrase. Even right hon. Gentlemen opposite sometimes repented. At any rate, they ought to. He regretted the concession which the Prime Minister had felt himself justified in making. He failed to find in the arguments which had been advanced anything proving that the time-limit proposed was too short, and he was there to say, on behalf of the temperance people with whom he worked, that, whatever financial arrangements might be made by His Majesty's Government, they would not give thanks for a Bill which postponed the temperance reforms which they all so much desired for a longer period than fourteen years. So rapid had been the education of the people during the discussion of this measure that he said, if owing to the operations of another House, the Government found themselves unable to carry their Bill with the time-limit of fourteen years, temperance reformers would sooner drop the Bill altogether and wait the issue between the nation and that most dangerous trade—for he was confident that the nation would not wait much longer for a genuine settlement of this question.

MR. BARNARD (Kidderminster) said he took a totally different view from the last speaker and welcomed the announcement made by the Prime Minister. But he would like to ask if he understood the right hon. Gentleman rightly to foreshadow that on some future occasion the Government would give the seven years referred to and also give a preference to the sitting tenant in connection with having the first opportunity of continuing in his tenancy. He was, as the House knew, opposed to the Bill, but he had come there prepared to vote for any Amendment which would improve it, and from his point of view it seemed to him the offer of the Prime Minister was far and away better for the trade than what was offered by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney. What did it amount to? It came to this, that after the end of the fourteen years—if ever it did come to an end—the tenant would be in the position of continuing to occupy the house for another seven years without having to pay monopoly value, for that period he would be relieved from the compensation charge. Surely that was far and away better than twenty-one years under existing conditions. He would like to press his question as to preference being given to the sitting tenant. They had been told in many speeches that there was no desire to interfere with the existing tenant, and therefore he would like to see words inserted giving that tenant a reasonable priority. As the existing tenant must be a dying person it would not be creating a new vested interest to do this.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said it was very difficult to discuss the proposal of the Prime Minister, because they really did not yet know what it amounted to. The last speaker had interpreted it in quite a different sense from the hon. Member for the Appleby Division, who evidently thought they were going to get local option at the end of fourteen years. He did not see how that could be compatible with the proposal made by the Prime Minister, and if it were, then he thought the hon. Member for Kidderminster would hesitate before welcoming it as an improvement on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney. The language of the right hon. Gentleman was perhaps, necessarily vague, and the great probability was, as the Prime Minister knew very well, that they would never have an opportunity of discussing the proposal when it was put on the Paper in black and white. So that they had to make up their minds now whether that proposal was one which at all met the objections they had hitherto felt to the Bill. Speaking for himself, he might say at once that it did not. The hon. Member for the Appleby division in picturesque language had said that the great issue was whether the trade should master the country or the country master the trade. He ventured to say that had nothing at all to do with the question. [Mr. CLOUGH, Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton: Hear hear.] He did not expect to be able to convince the hon. Member for Skipton and had never succeeded, but, as he had said, that was not the real point at issue. The Prime Minister said the question at issue was, "Are you or are you not in favour of the State resuming its monopoly?" He was in favour of it. It would be desirable, he thought, to get rid of anything which was in the nature of a State-aided trade—a trade which depended for part of its profits upon a special privilege given to it by the State. He had always said that. But he said that if they were to do that they must pay for it. That was the whole point. It was on this point he differed from the hon. Member for the Appleby Division. The hon. Member seemed to think he was entitled to get this advantage for the State without paying for it. He differed from him. He did not care a straw about the elaborate argument as to whether the property was freehold or not; it was a thing which had a money value in the open market, and if they were going to take it away from the men who now had it they must pay for it.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The noble Lord is now going back to yesterday's discussion.

LORD R. CECIL said he had not intended to do so; he had merely made that observation in passing. The Prime Minister had said this value had been greatly exaggerated. He failed to see how that affected the point whether the Government's proposal was fair, and whether the State was going to pay for the advantage which it sought to get. He could not understand the position of those who claimed to be right, and proposed to carry their morality into effect at the expense of other people. When a public improvement was executed, the people whose property was taken were not called upon to pay for it; when they cleared away unhealthy areas they paid the full value of the property taken for the purpose; but, in regard to the licences which would be taken, the Prime Minister admitted to the full that a large proportion of the cost of that public improvement would be paid, not by the State, but by the individuals from whom the licences were taken. He certainly could not understand the justice of that, and he should vote for the Amendment not because it was satisfactory but because it was at any rate an improvement on the proposal of the Government.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) asked the Prime Minister if he understood the change which he had made in a complicated scheme to be that, if an existing licence were renewed at the end of the fourteen or fifteen years time-limit, the holder was not to pay more for that licence than he paid on the present scale—that the scale on which he paid was not to be increased in respect of the monopoly value during the next seven years.

MR. ASQUITH: This is not a question of taxation at all. It is a question of the conditions under which justices renew licences. Under the Act of 1904 justices might attach as a condition to the grant of a new licence the payment of the whole monopoly value. Under the Bill, as it stands, that would apply to all other licences as well. The suggestion now is that in regard to licences that existed prior to the passing of the Act, that particular condition shall not be put into force for the time being.

MR. WYNDHAM said he thought he did understand the point. The magistrates need not renew the licence; and, if the Committee adopted the Amendment down in the name of the First Commissioner of Works, it could also be taken away by a two-thirds majority of the parish. There were two possibilities by which the existing licence holder might not receive the concession which the Prime Minister offered. He need hardly say that that concession did not modify his opinion of the injustice of the scheme, whilst it did—and he invited the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the point—increase the arbitrary incidence of that injustice. They would, or might have, an existing licence holder in one parish who got a renewal, who had not to pay compensation, and who had not to pay any more as a condition of the magistrates granting it, whilst in the next parish, perhaps a hundred yards away, another licence holder might lose the whole of his property. They would thus create a more glaring injustice as between those two men.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley) said that, when they were discussing the legal right and power of the nation to deal with the licences, he felt they must insist upon that right very stringently and very strictly. He felt they must establish that principle; but when it came to settling the length of the time limit, it was a matter of expediency and arrangement, and he had always been amongst those—perhaps right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite would not think it amounted to much—who were anxious and willing to deal with the trade, as he considered, generously. They might not consider it generous, but it had been his view. They had to recognise the position which had grown up, but let them have the principle established, and although he thought the fourteen years ample, he was not going to quarrel with the Prime Minister for making an addition to it. After all, they wanted to establish a great principle and a great policy, and the sooner they could do that the better; but he would give a few years extra in order that it might be done with less friction and less inconvenience to the nation. He wanted to get it and he would make it more difficult for those who would otherwise refuse it to do so. Therefore, whilst he was one of those who thought fourteen years really ample, he was not going to vote against seven years extension of the surrender of the monopoly value. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said that it did not amount to much and suggested two possibilities by which a man might still lose his licence. He was always interested to hear the views of right hon. Gentlemen opposite on questions of temperance reform. They spoke on them from opposite points of view. Sometimes they told them that local veto would be no use because the vast majority of the people wanted the public-houses. The Leader of the Opposition had told them that that afternoon. If that was so, why did they object to local veto?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that if the hon. Member referred to his argument it was that local veto, whether it did or did not abolish public houses, did produce an insecurity which was bad in itself.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER said he was referring to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman that the majority of the people wanted the licences. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover, however, would prefer that they should thrust licences upon a district against the wish of two-thirds of the people of the locality. Then, with regard to the discretion of the justices, he thought they might assume that, after the great reduction had been effected, there would be good and substantial reasons if a licence were taken away. He attached importance to the financial question, and he believed a great number of people in the country wished that there should be a time limit during which those in the trade could accumulate funds to enable them to write off any loss. Surely twenty-one years was a very different term from fourteen years. It would enable them to accumulate more than half as much again. Practically, the fourteen years notice was fifteen years notice, because the fourteen years did not commence till next year, and the twenty-one years notice was really twenty-two years. In fifteen years £1 accumulated annually at 4 per cent. compound interest would amount to £20, and in twenty-two years £1 accumulated annually at 4 per cent. compound interest would amount to £34. That was a very great difference indeed, and it would make an enormous difference in enabling the trade to deal with the question. Of course he knew that some would say it did not matter, and, even if they were able to accumulate these funds, they had no right to call upon them to do it. They, however, said that with a precarious security and a risky grant they ought to be prepared to deal with it. Some illustrations had been given, but he noticed that they did not allow for or take into consideration any preparations already made. Prudent concerns had already accumulated very considerable reserve funds, and they would not have the whole preparation to make during the fourteen or twenty-one years. Some of them had made very considerable preparations; and, even if those funds were invested in public-house licences and those licence values had to be written off, it was simply a matter of book-keeping arrangement. They had only to write off the value of the licences on one side of their balance sheet and their reserve fund on the other side and the thing was done. If the money were invested in licence values, obviously, when those values disappeared the reserve fund disappeared. Surely hon. Gentlemen opposite did not expect that they could write off something and still have the reserve fund remaining; they were assuming some elementary knowledge of finance. It was clear that if the reserve fund was that of some other trade and was invested in licence values, and they wanted to realise them for some other purpose, they would not be available, but the fact that it was invested in the very property to be written off provided the remedy. A very large number of concerns had very prudently accumulated reserves, and this addition to the time during which they could accumulate the extra funds required, would make an enormous difference, it would ease the situation very much indeed, and certainly, so far as he was concerned, he should not do anything to oppose such a proposal.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.) said he was sometimes unable to work himself up to such a state of indignation as regarded this Bill as some of his hon. friends, but he thought that in the speeches of the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley and the hon. Member for the Appleby Division of Westmoreland, there might be found justification for the phrase "thrown to the wolves." The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had dismissed the question of loss of reserve capital by thousands of traders as a mere matter of book-keeping. The hon. Member for Appleby said he was a temperance reformer, he wanted temperance, and he did not care twopence about financial considerations. The country, however, did take these matters into consideration, and was not prepared to accept the Bill as a punitive measure invented by the right hon. Member and the hon. Member opposite. Both had spoken of the fourteen years proposal as having come scathless through Committee, but that could scarcely be so seeing the Prime Minister had adumbrated an Amendment to be submitted at a later stage. The hon. Member for the Appleby division was not in the House when the hon. Baronet the Member for Chippenham referred to the time limit as a "reign of terror," and perhaps the Rosespierre and Marat of the period might be found in the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley and the hon. Member for Appleby. The Prime Minister had suggested an Amendment which was not altogether understood, and discussion was impossible under an absolutely unnecessary closure resolution, while Ministers skulked under the scaffolding of the guillotine.

MR. BOTTOMLEY said he had a little difficulty in deciding what course to adopt in view of the Prime Minister's statement. He desired to do what would meet the general convenience of the Committee. If he clearly understood the right hon. Gentleman's statement, it was the intention on the Report Stage to put down some clause giving present licence-holders a further respite, or purgatorial period of seven years. His own view, if he might respectfully say so, was that the Committee should have an opportunity of seeing the Amendment in black and white, and then consider on the Report Stage whether it met the points raised and how, and whether a case had been made out for re-opening the matter at that stage. Subject to the view of the Committee he was disposed to withdraw his Amendment and not put them to the trouble of a division, which must of necessity result in cross-votings because nobody could understand where they were. Therefore, he formally asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Leave to withdraw being refused—

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 387; Noes, 119. (Division List No. 263.)

Copy presented, of Old-Age Pensions Regulations, dated 15th October, 1908,

[by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 304.]

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Account presented, of Receipts and Expenditure of the Paymaster-General on behalf of the Supreme Court of Judicature in respect of the Funds of Suitors of the Court in the year ended 29th February 1908, and of Account of the National Debt Commissioners for the same period in respect of Funds held by them on behalf of the Supreme Court of Judicature, with the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General thereon [by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 305.]

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (EVIC-TION NOTICES).

Copy presented, of Return of Eviction Notices filed during the quarter ended 30th September 1908 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

AGRICULTURE STATISTICS (IRELAND).

Copy presented, of Agriculture Statistics of Ireland for the year 1907 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1907.

CATTLE-DRIVES (IRELAND).

Return ordered, "by counties and quarterly periods, of the number of Cattle-drives reported by the Royal Irish Constabulary to have taken place in Ireland from the 1st day of January, 1907 to the 30th day of September, 1908."—(Mr. Lonsdale.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Discharge of Joiners from Pembroke Dockyard.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that when joiners are discharged from the Royal Dockyard at Pembroke a large and undue proportion of those discharged are men who are members of a trade union, the reason being given that they will receive 10s. per week from their trade society, whilst those that do not belong to a society will get nothing; and whether he will take steps to put a stop to this treatment of workmen who belong to a trade union.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) No joiners have been discharged at Pembroke Dock during the last three years. The selection of the joiners who were discharged in 1904-5 was determined according to service and capability, and, so far as can be ascertained, there is nothing to support the suggestion that membership of a trade union or otherwise was taken into consideration.

Old-Age Pensions Rules.

MR. CORRIE GRANT (Warwickshire, Rugby): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether an allowance of 10s. per week made by an employer to an old servant is means within the meaning of the Old Age Pensions Act.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The point referred to in the Question is, with some others, at present receiving consideration, and a definite answer cannot at the moment be given.

Supplementary Estimates.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the total amounts, gross and net, of the Supplementary Estimates submitted to this House during the financial year 1907-8, with the Department responsible for each.

Supplementary Estimates, 1907-8.

Number of House of Commons Paper.	Service.	Gross Amount.	Net Amount.	Accounting Department.
28/08	Army - - -	£ 358,000	£ 100	War Office

	Mint, including Coin- age	2,370	20	Mint
	Public Trustee - -	2,270	1,870	Public Trustee
	Treasury Chest Fund	327	327	Treasury
35/08	Post Office - - -	260,000	260,000	Post Office
	Law Charges, &c., Ireland	2,500	2,500	Chief Secretary's Office
	Royal Irish Constabu- lary	5,000	5,000	Inspector General, Royal Irish Con- stabulary
	Board of Education	6,000	6,000	Board of Education
		1,454,246	1,091,846

In addition to the above Supplementary Estimates, the sum of £50,000 was voted as a grant to the Earl of Cromer, on the presentation of a Message from His Majesty the King.

Administration of the Poor Law in Poplar.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware of the interpretation put upon the Order which issued from his office this year relating to the modified workhouse test, under which the Poplar guardians are disbursing relief up to a maximum of 17s. 6d. a week to the families of men employed at the farm colonies at Laindon and Forest Gate; and whether he proposes to make another investigation into the administration of the Poor Law in Poplar.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am aware of the action taken under the Order referred to. That Order has now lapsed and in lieu of it a new one has been issued, laying down amended conditions under which relief may be given out of the workhouse by the Poplar guardians to the families of able-bodied men who are relieved in the workhouse. I hope that it will not be necessary that any further inquiry should be held of the kind suggested in the Question.

Assessment of Railway Companies.

MR. REES: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he proposes to take any steps to protect railway companies against over-assessment under the parochial system now in force, and to provide for their assessment in respect of total net annual value.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) If a railway company considers that it is over-assessed, its remedy is to appeal against the assessment. I am not myself empowered to take any action in the matter. Whether there should be any alteration in the law with regard to the assessment of railways is a matter which will receive consideration in connection with the Valuation Bill.

Work for Unemployed at Leeds.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if the afforestation work undertaken near Leeds to provide work for the unemployed last year is being continued; and, if so, how many men are now employed; and how much money will be devoted to it this winter.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The afforestation work on the Leeds Corporation Waterworks estate is being continued. I learn that some of the unemployed are already engaged on the work, and that it is intended to expend £600 this winter in the wages of unemployed, and a similar amount in the wages of experienced men.

MR. FELL: To ask the President of the Local Government Board if any Report or statement can be laid before the House giving the result of the afforestation experiment at Leeds, so far as it has gone, with the number of unemployed who were engaged, the acreage and number of trees planted, and the cost of the experiment.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The waterworks engineer of the Leeds Corporation has made a report on the result of three seasons' afforestation work on the corporation's waterworks estate. The following are the totals of the figures for the three years 1905-6, 1906-7, and 1907-8—

Number of unemployed engaged	-	-	476
Area planted	-	-	514 acres
Number of trees planted	-	-	1,514,300
Cost of the experiment, including £1,043 spent in 1904-5 for barracks	-	-	£7,194.

Local Government Board and the Motor Speed Limit.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the statements made at a meeting of the Guildford District Council to the effect that the Local Government Board put every block in the way of getting a speed limit for motors in villages; whether the same district council supported the action of the Sand and Ripley parishes for the fixing of a speed-limit in those villages; and what action he has taken in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have seen a newspaper report of the proceedings of the Guildford Rural District Council at which the statements referred to were made. It appears that the Surrey County Council have had before them a number of applications from various parts of the county for the imposition of low speed-limits for motor cars. Three of these proposals they have put forward to the Local Government Board, and I have directed local inquiry upon them. None of these proposals relate to the parishes of Send or Ripley.

MR. HAROLD COX: To ask the President of the Local Government Board what action has been taken by him with regard to the application made by the Middlesex County Council and the Staines Rural District Council for the fixing of a ten-mile speed-limit for motor cars in a certain part of the parish of Shepperton.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) An inquiry has been held with reference to the application, and the Board have informed the Middlesex County Council that they have decided to comply with it. The order will be issued as soon as the notices indicating the reduced speed-limit are ready for erection.

Unemployed and Poor Relief.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the reports of several distress committees in London to the effect that the regulation that an applicant for work must not have received poor relief within the preceding twelve months operates with great hardship in particular cases, especially when the relief given has been only to the extent of two or three shillings, and perhaps on one occasion only; and whether he will repeal this regulation, so that the distress committees may be free to deal with each case on its merits.

MR. PICKERSGILL: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the report of the Camberwell Distress Committee that the regulation that the applicant for work must not have received assistance on relief works in two successive years preceding his application presses hardly on those engaged in season trades; and whether, pending more effective provision for those engaged in such trades, he will suspend this regulation.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) Perhaps I may be allowed to answer together this and the Question which follows it on the Paper. The reports to which my hon. friend refers have been brought under my notice and I have given attention to the points raised in them. As, however, the subject of the unemployed is now under the consideration of the Government, I think it better to defer for the moment giving a decision with regard to them.

Publication of Report of Poor Law Commission.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state the date on which the Poor Law Commission Report will be received.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The Royal Commission are now engaged in considering their Report, and I understand that they are making every effort to accelerate its completion. It is hoped that it will be presented by the end of the year.

Motor Speed-Limit in London Parks.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state by what law power is given to limit the speed of motor vehicles to ten miles an hour in the London parks, and for what reason the power is not exercised to impose the same limit of speed in the crowded thoroughfares of the metropolis.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The authority for the limitation of the speed of motor cars in the royal parks in London is the Parks Regulation Act, 1872, and the statutory rules made thereunder. The Act only applies to "the royal parks, gardens, and possessions, the management of which is for the time being vested in the Commissioners" of His Majesty's Works, and the powers conferred by it could not be exercised as regards the speed of motor cars in the streets.

Limiting of Speed of Motor Vehicles.

MR. MACKARNESS: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will state how many applications were made to the Local Government Board by local authorities for orders to reduce the speed of motor cars to ten miles an hour in the years 1904 and 1905, and how many since; which are the local authorities who have so applied and when; and in how many cases the applications were granted prior to 1906, and in how many since.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) During the years 1904 and 1905, forty-eight applications were made to the Local Government Board by local authorities for the reduction of the speed of motor cars to ten miles per hour on certain roads, namely, seven by county councils and forty-one by town councils. Since 1905 there have been fifty-four such applications, namely, thirty-seven by county councils and seventeen by town councils. In a considerable number of cases these applications have been subsequently abandoned or allowed to lapse. No order fixing a speed limit of ten miles was issued in 1904, one was issued in 1905. Since that date twenty such orders have been issued and another is about to issue.

County Councils and Licence Duties.

MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can give the date for the transfer to county councils of powers to levy certain duties under the Finance Act, 1908, Section 6; and if he is unable to do so now, whether he will consider the desirability of doing so as soon as possible for the convenience of those engaged in the preliminary work necessary for carrying out the provisions of the Act.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) It is proposed that the transfer should take effect on the 1st January next.

Trawling in Prohibited Areas Bill— Second Reading.

MR. ESSLEMONT: (Aberdeen, S.): To ask the Secretary for Scotland, on what date the Second Reading of the Trawling in Prohibited Areas Prevention Bill will be taken.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The date is not yet fixed.

Alleged Cruelty to Natives at the Franco-British Exhibition.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the exhibition of alleged natives of Ceylon in the Franco-British Exhibition, exposed to climatic and other conditions prejudicial to their health; whether the present arrangements have the sanction of the Home Office; and, if not, can he intervene for the protection of these people.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The arrangements made for these persons do not require the sanction of the Home Office, but I have made inquiries, and I am assured by the authorities of the exhibition that they are well supplied with woollen underwear and blankets; that a physician attends regularly at the "Ceylon Village," but up to the present there has not been a single case of serious illness among the natives; and that the sanitary inspector on Saturday last informed the authorities in charge of the village that the living rooms and sleeping accommodation there do not give cause for the slightest complaint.

Children and Street Trading.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the Report of the Inter-departmental Committee in 1901 and the strong expression of opinion by the chief constable of Manchester in 1906, condemnatory of employment of children in street trading, and the fact that in Glasgow and other large cities evidence is forthcoming that street trading leads to grave physical and moral deterioration of boys and girls, he will insert a clause in the Children Bill making it illegal for boys or girls under sixteen to be engaged in street trading on any terms whatsoever, or, as an alternative, a clause raising the age below which street trading is illegal from eleven to fourteen.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) It is not proposed to insert any provision in the Children's Bill on the subject of street trading, for reasons which were explained by me in reply to a Question on the 12th March last by the hon. Member for the Ealing Division of Middlesex. As has already been announced, the Government will propose next session the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the question of street trading by children and young persons.

Inspectorships of Factories.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the principle of nomination for permission to sit at public competitive examinations for inspectorships and assistant inspectorships of factories still exists in his department; if so, will he say what are the advantages to the country in so restricting these examinations to those who have influence; and whether he will make these appointments in future open to merit apart from social status.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The Answer to the second part is that the hon. Member is under a complete misapprehension in supposing that social influence has anything whatever to do with the selection of a candidate. If my hon. friend will refer to the debate on the Home Office Estimates on the 18th July 1907, he will see in detail the arguments for the present system.

Extra Police employed during Suffragists' Disturbance.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what number of police were employed in and around the Palace of Westminster, including Trafalgar Square, during the last week; how many were drawn from reserves; and what extra remuneration will be paid, in view of the protracted nature of their services.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

I do not think it is advisable to publish full details of the strength of the police employed on certain occasions, and no doubt my hon. friend will agree that this objection is not unreasonable. All the men employed beyond their regular hours will receive equivalent time off.

Traction Engines on Highways.

MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that owners of traction engines habitually ignore the requirement of Section 29 of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, that one person shall precede the locomotive at least twenty yards on foot to assist drivers of horses; and whether he will issue a circular to chief constables of counties as to this provision and take steps to secure that the law is enforced.

MR. HERBERT: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that proprietors of light traction engines appear to be under the impression that the sole condition enabling them to work as motors without the presence of a third man is that they shall be under six tons in weight, and that the police in many counties appear to share this impression; and whether he will call the attention of chief constables of counties to the further requirement of the Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, that such traction engines can only work without a third man if they emit neither smoke nor vapour except as a temporary or accidental matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

I will answer these Questions together. The central authority for the purposes of the Locomotives Act is the Local Government Board, and I will consult with my right hon. friend the President as to whether it is desirable to issue a circular to the police on the points mentioned by my hon. friend.

Licences for the Sale of Liquor.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any statistics are available of the number of licences in existence in the United Kingdom year by year from any period anterior to the Licensing Act of 1872; if not, what is the earliest date from which such figures could be given; and whether he would consent to a Return being ordered of the number of licences in each year for such period, distinguishing the number of on-licences from the number of off-licences, and exhibiting separately the proportion of licences in each class to every 10,000 of population, as well as the like numbers and proportion for each of the three Kingdoms separately.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

If the right hon. Gentleman desires statistics of licensed premises similar to those which are now issued annually from my Department, I have to say that, after causing the existing Parliamentary Papers on the subject for England and Wales to be examined, I am afraid that they, though numerous from the year 1873 onwards, as will be seen from the indexes, are of such a nature that even if it were possible within a reasonable time to condense them into a single Return, the result would not be sufficiently complete and trustworthy to be of any value. The right hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that the Board of Inland Revenue prepared for the Royal Commission on Licensing Laws a statement of licences issued by them from the year 1829 onwards, see page 426 and onwards of Volume 1 of the Minutes of Evidence, published by that Commission, and that since the date of that statement the Board's annual Reports give similar figures. For various reasons, which the right hon. Gentleman will understand, these figures of Excise licences are not strictly comparable with the figures of licensed premises, and I doubt whether it would serve his purpose to reissue them in a special Return, giving the proportions borne by the various classes of Excise licences to population.

Accident at Dalbeath Pit.

MR. PONSONBY (Stirling Burghs): To ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the death of Robert Adamson in November last year by the collapse of a brick arch in the Dalbeath Pit, belonging to the Fife Coal Company; whether, owing to the unsatisfactory nature of the public inquiry which was held, instructions will be given for a further public inquiry or a Home Office inquiry being instituted into the whole facts and circumstances connected with the accident; and whether he will consider the advisability of issuing an order allowing the representatives of injured or deceased workmen to get access to the locus of an accident immediately after it happens.

(Answered by Mr. Thomas Shaw.) I am having inquiries instituted into this matter by the Crown Office and on the spot, and I should be glad to communicate the result of these to my hon. friend either privately or in answer to a Question, say, in ten days time.

Messrs. J. and P. Coats' Request to Public Prosecutor.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): To ask the Lord Advocate whether he has received a request from Messrs. J. and

P. Coats, Limited, Paisley, to prosecute a firm of coal factors for a gross case of fraud, which latter could not have been perpetrated unless it had been connived at by the colliery who supplied the coal, who, to bolster up the fraud, issued a false certificate as to the quality; whether, accompanying that request to prosecute, there was documentary evidence of the clearest character to insure a conviction; and, if so, why a prosecution was not instituted by the Public Prosecutor.

(Answered by Mr. Thomas Shaw.) I do not think it would be either in the public interest or fair to the parties concerned to canvass the narrative given in the Question. I must not, however, be held as acquiescing in it as accurate. But upon the specific point put whether the documentary evidence was such as to insure a criminal conviction I have to inform the hon. Member that I personally and carefully considered the documents and available evidence in this case and came to hold the opinion, confirming that of the Solicitor-General for Scotland, that these were not such as would secure a criminal conviction of the persons against whom Messrs. Coats made this charge of fraud. This being so, it would have been improper for me to order proceedings. It is open to Messrs. Coats to institute a civil action of damages in respect of the matter complained of, but this, for some reason, they delay or decline to do.

Richmond Park.

MR. C. B. HARMSWORTH (Worcestershire, Droitwich): To ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will state what steps have been taken to fulfil the promise that portions of Richmond Park should be thrown open to the public and that game preserving should cease; and if he is prepared to state whether any ground or woods have been thrown open, and, if so, the acreage.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) My attention has been drawn to certain inaccurate statements which have appeared on this subject. I am glad to be able to assure the House that they are absolutely without foundation. By direction of His Majesty game preserving in Richmond Park has entirely ceased since the death of the late Duke of Cambridge. A certain number of pheasants, partridges, and hares breed wild in the park, but no game is preserved or shot. More than 100 acres of covert and paddock have been thrown open to the public, cricket and football grounds have been made, and a miniature rifle range has been established. It is hoped that it may be possible to make further additions to the park, but, as my hon. friend will readily understand, we are obliged to keep certain coverts closed in order to encourage the wild birds, which are one of the most charming and interesting features of the park.

Accuracy of Discussion Reported in Cd. 4185 (1908).

MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the report of a discussion set out in Command Paper 4185, of 1908, which took place on the 13th of May between the Secretary to the Board of Education and a deputation representative of educational associations on the subject of a teacher's register was ever submitted before publication to the members of the deputation whose views are there represented, or, if not, what other steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the report which does not profess to be verbatim accurately expresses the views put forward by the deputation.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The answer to the first paragraph is in the negative. But the report was compiled from notes taken at the time and was very carefully revised at the hands of three different officials, each of whom was present throughout the discussion, and it is confidently believed that it accurately expresses what passed. The Board have received no intimation or suggestion from any member of the deputation that this is not the case.

Constitution of a Registration Council.

MR. BUTCHER: To ask the President of the Board of Education what are the reasons for the delay in giving effect to the provisions of 7 Edw. 7, c. 43, s. 16, regarding the constitution of a registration council.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The proposals for the constitution of a registration council, which were submitted to the Board by a committee comprising delegates from twelve educational associations and which have since been published, have elicited protests from various important sections of the teaching profession. The weight attaching to these objections makes it difficult to regard a council so constituted as representative of the profession, as required by the statute. I have referred these protests to the committee, and I am hoping to receive from them revised proposals which will command general agreement.

Applications for Old-Age Pensions.

MR. TIMOTHY DAVIES (Fulham): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can state the number of applications received up to date for old-age pensions, giving the number claiming 1s., 2s., 3s., 4s., and 5s. respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The total numbers of claims received by pension officers up to the 10th instant amounts to 468,164, of which 273,862 come from England, 131,610 from Ireland, 49,077 from Scotland, and 13,615 from Wales. The information at present in my possession does not enable me to classify these applications according to the amount claimed in each case.

Consumption of Beer and Spirits.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it would be possible to give a Return showing separately for each of the three Kingdoms the amount of spirits and beer consumed per head of the population as shown for the United Kingdom on page 130 of the current number of the Statistical Abstract; and, if so, whether such Return could be carried back to any period before the Licensing Act of 1872.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Return could be given on the lines followed in the Financial Relations Return, but not for any years before 1888.

Old-Age Pensions Claims.

MR. VERNEY: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether applicants for pensions, duly qualified as regards age and in other respects, now in receipt of weekly wages which will terminate at the end of the current year, and who will then be without any income, are justified, under the Pension Act, in claiming full pensions as having no income.

direct the attention of the Estates Commissioners to the matter with a view of purchasing the occupier's interest, reinstating the former evicted tenant, and increasing existing uneconomic holdings in the neighbourhood.

MR. KILBRIDE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the townland of Oghill, Monasterevan, County Kildare, on the Drogheda estate, there are thirty holdings varying from one to ten acres; whether his attention has been directed to the advertisement of sale of the late Mr. Conlan's farm of 300 acres at Oghill on the 30th instant, also on the Drogheda estate; and whether he will cause the Estates Commissioners to inquire into the facts with a view to purchasing the late Mr. Conlan's interest and have the lands divided so as to increase the size of the existing uneconomic holdings in the neighbourhood.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Purchase agreements have recently been lodged with the Estates Commissioners in respect of twenty-three holdings on the estate of the Earl of Drogheda, including an agreement signed by Peter Conlan for the purchase of his holding at Oghill comprising 296 acres. In seventeen out of the twenty-three cases the area of the holding does not exceed ten acres. The Commissioners have no knowledge that the tenant's interest in Conlan's or any other case has been advertised for sale. But in any event, having regard to the statutory conditions under which the Commissioners act, it is not possible for them to attend and bid at sales by auction, nor have they power to make any advance out of the Land Purchase Fund for the purchase of a tenant's interest.

Camping on Frensham Common.

MR. HORNIMAN (Chelsea): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office is in negotiation for or contemplates the formation of a cavalry or other camp on or near Frensham Common, Surrey.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) There is no intention of establishing a permanent camp on Frensham Common. The hon. Member is doubtless aware that the troops of the Aldershot Command are frequently encamped on the common every year.

Weekly Payment of Army Pensions.

MR. GOULDING (Worcester): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the pensions under the Old-Age Pensions Act are to be paid weekly, he will give instructions for Army pensioners receiving pensions not exceeding £35 a year to be also paid weekly.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Will the hon. Member kindly refer to my reply to a Question on this subject put by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight Division of Hampshire on the 14th instant?

Director-General of Army Finance.

MR. ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether a Director-General of Army Finance has been appointed in place of Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson; if not, whether it is intended to appoint such an officer, and, if the office of Director-General is to be abolished or held in suspense, whether an Order in Council will be necessary to regularise the alteration; and upon what officer will the duties of the Director-General of Army Finance devolve.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) An officer has been appointed, with the title of Assistant Financial Secretary, to take the place of Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson as accounting officer to the War Office and to carry on the duties of the post of Director-General of Army Finance, with the exception of contract questions, which will go to the Director of Contracts. The terms of the necessary Order in Council are now under consideration.

Courts of Quarter Sessions.

MR. GRETTON (Rutland): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number and names of the large boroughs having a separate Court of quarter sessions and also the number and names of those boroughs which, being large boroughs within the meaning of Clause 17 of the Licensing Bill, do not possess a separate Court of quarter sessions.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)
The names and numbers of "large boroughs," within the meaning of Clause 17 of the Licensing Bill, with and without separate Courts of quarter sessions, respectively, are as follows :—

Large Boroughs. (Licensing Bill, Clause 17.)

(a) With separate Courts of Quarter Session.

Number of Cabs—Motor and Horse Drawn.

MR. B. S. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can give the number of taxi-motor cabs licensed on 30th September this year, and also the number of hansoms and four-wheelers licensed on the same date.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)
 On the 30th September the following were the numbers of the different kinds of licensed cabs:—

Motor cabs	-	-	2,273
Hansom cabs	-	-	5,095
Four-wheeled horse cabs			3,754
Total			- 11,122

Postal Facilities at Ballina and Crossmolina.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Postmaster-

General if he is aware that although the day mail arrives at Ballina, county Mayo, at 11.40 a.m., the mail car carrying the mail to the important town of Crossmolina, six miles distant, does not leave Ballina till about 4.30 p.m., and the letters are not delivered till 6.15 p.m. at the earliest; is he aware that large numbers of people get the daily papers by this service as well as their letters, which include all English letters of the preceding day; can he say why it is necessary to start the mail car from Ballina so late; and will he make arrangements whereby it could leave about 12.30 p.m., and so have letters and papers delivered in Crossmolina by 2 o'clock, or thereabouts.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The postal service to Crossmolina is already carried on at a considerable loss to the Revenue, and, as the alteration suggested by the hon. Member would involve additional cost, I should not be justified in adopting it. Moreover, some advantage is gained by the present arrangement, inasmuch as it admits of correspondence posted in Dublin in the morning being delivered at Crossmolina the same day.

Meals for School Children.

MR. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can state how many education authorities throughout the country have applied for power to levy a rate with which to supply meals to necessitous children, under Section 3 of the Education (Provision of Meals) Act, 1906.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) Fifty-seven.

Completion of Marble Arch Improvements.

MR. HORNIMAN: To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can state at what date the new gates and lamps at the Marble Arch will be erected, so completing this improvement.

(Answered by Mr. L. Hurcourt.) This is a portion of the improvement for which the London County Council is responsible, but it is expected that the gates and lamps will be erected by the end of this year.

Warranty on Fat Stock.

MR. STANIER (Shropshire, Newport): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if the action of the National Federation of Meat Sellers in demanding a warranty on fat stock and the farmers' refusal to give one has been brought to the notice of the Board; and, if so, does the Board propose to take any action.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The Board are carefully watching the discussions which are taking place on this subject, but they do not at present see that they can usefully take any action with regard to it.

Potato Disease in Dumfries.

MR. MOLTENO (Dumfriesshire): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the Board of Agriculture, whether he can state upon what information the county of Dumfries was scheduled as affected with the potato disease known as black scab; whether any notification has been received during the current year of the occurrence of this disease; whether he can state if any steps were taken to verify the notification when first made, and the date of this notification; upon receiving the notification, was an expert sent down to make any examination or inquiry on the spot; was any communication made to the authorities on the spot, such as the County Agricultural Committee; was the locality placed under observation and were any steps taken to deal with and eradicate the disease or circumscribe the area of its occurrence; has any notification been received this year in regard to the occurrence of this disease, and, if so, will he state the neighbourhood in which such disease has occurred and whether any steps have been taken to investigate and report upon this occurrence; whether he is aware of the injury which has been done to the county by placing the whole county in a schedule as if such county were affected throughout; and whether, in view of the fact that the only case reported occurred in a garden last year and that no case has been reported this year from any part of the county, and in view of the injury which has been done by this notification, the Board will be prepared to make public all the circumstances connected with this case (Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The county of Dumfries has not been scheduled as affected with warty disease of potatoes, but the fact that the disease exists there has been notified to the Press with the view of reminding potato growers that black scab is a notifiable disease under the Destructive Insects and Pests Order of 1908. A notification of the existence of the disease in a garden was received in August last from a potato grower in the county, and the specimen forwarded by him was certified as being affected with black scab by the Board's expert advisers at the Royal Gardens, Kew. The owner was advised as to the nature, prevention, and remedy of the disease. Neither the County Agricultural Committee nor any other local authority are charged with any duties under the Order, and no communication was therefore made to them. An inspector has visited the locality and made a tour of inspection, and though he has found the existence of the disease in two other gardens he has no reason to suppose that it has spread to the farms of the county. The Board, in accordance with their usual practice in dealing with outbreaks of disease, do not propose to publish the names and addresses of the owners of the gardens where the disease exists, but so far as they are aware it has not affected the field crops in this county, and there is no need for alarm.

Examination of Seamen by Board of Trade.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the number of cases where seamen have been examined by the nautical surveyors of the Board of Trade when there has been any doubt as to the efficiency of such seamen engaged on board of British ships, and the number of such examinations since the year 1897.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) No special record has been kept of the cases to which my hon. friend refers, but inquiries shall be made and the result communicated to him.

Reservation for Government Use of Line from Essen to Coast of Germany.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the main line from Essen to the North and West Coast of Germany has been and is still being reserved exclusively to the carriage of Government goods, chiefly armaments, so that ordinary trade is sent by a longer route.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I have no information on the subject.

Working of the Inebriates Act in Scotland.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he proposes to appoint a Committee to deal with the question of the working of the Inebriates Acts so far as they relate to Scotland.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) Yes, Sir. The Committee will be appointed very shortly.

Civil Servants and Confidential Reports.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether, in view of the injury done to Government servants who have been compelled to retire from the Civil Service in consequence of false reports made in secret by superior officers under cover of confidential memoranda, His Majesty's Government will favourably consider the desirability of the creation of a board of appeal composed of three Privy Counsellors, or other persons of suitable qualifications, so that public servants, having no remedy for redress in the Courts owing to the plea of privilege raised on behalf of the Crown, may be able to submit cases of alleged tyranny and oppression to an independent tribunal competent to examine witnesses upon oath.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) I see no necessity for the appointment of such a body.

Preparation of Return of Inland Revenue (Death Duties) Public-Houses.

MR. WHITBREAD (Huntingdonshire, Huntingdon): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, since the issue of the Parliamentary Paper, Inland Revenue (Death Duties) Public-Houses, dated 14th May, 1890, and previous to the passing of The Finance Act, 1894, any instructions, and, if so, what instructions, were issued altering the practice of the Inland Revenue Department, as set out in the Paper of 14th May, 1891.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) No record can be traced of any instructions being given previous to 1894, altering the practice in force on the 14th May, 1890, in the Inland Revenue Department, in dealing, for Death Duty purposes, with the various interests connected with the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Income-Tax Exemptions for Charitable Purposes.

MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what total amount was during the financial year ending 31st March, 1907, exempted from income-tax as devoted to charitable purposes in the legal sense.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The amount is £11,105,000.

Indian Army—Gratuity for Qualifying as Interpreters.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether, under War Office Regulations of 1908, officers of the British service are now eligible for pecuniary rewards upon qualifying as interpreters in modern foreign languages, whereas no rewards are granted by the Indian Military Regulations to officers of the Indian Army who similarly qualify as interpreters for European languages, except in Russia; whether, in July, 1908, Indian Army officers who passed, respectively, in German and in French were held to be debarred under existing rules from receiving the gratuity, whereas officers in the British service are eligible for all pecuniary rewards for passing in Oriental languages paid by the Government in India; and whether the Secretary of State will consider the advisability of admitting officers of the Indian Army to the same privilege in this respect as those enjoyed by British officers, with effect from the date of the War Office order introducing the new scale of rewards.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The facts are as indicated in the hon.

Member's Question. The Secretary of State will consult the Government of India as to the advisability of making officers of the Indian Army eligible for rewards for qualifying as interpreters in European languages other than Russian.

Apportionment of Charges for Maintenance of British Army in India.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether, as the result of the consideration by the Committee which sat, under the presidency of Sir Robert Romer, on the question of the future apportionment between the Home and Indian Governments of the charges incurred in the United Kingdom in connection with the maintenance of the British Army in India, the Secretary of State has approved of the present payment by India to the War Office being increased by £300,000 a year from the 1st May, 1908; what direct representation of the interests of India, other than that afforded from the India Office, was furnished on the per-sonal of the Committee or examined as witnesses before it; and whether the Secretary of State will present the Report and Evidence of the Committee to Parliament, or, failing that, will agree to furnish a summary of the Report and Evidence to Parliament.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The recommendations of the Committee over which Sir Robert Romer presided dealt with questions of principle. On the basis of these recommendations the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War have arrived at an agreement that an additional payment of £300,000 a year shall be made, from 1st May, 1908, to cover the cost of the training of troops and other services connected with the maintenance of the British establishment in India. The representatives of India on the Committee were Sir John Edge, K.C., until recently a member of the Council of India, and Lieutenant-General Sir Beauchamp Duff, K.C.B., Chief of the Staff in India. The Committee did not examine witnesses. The Secretary of State does not propose to present the Report to Parliament.

Sexton of Catholic Church residing at Lixnaw Boys' School.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Lixnaw boys' school, County Kerry, is partly occupied by the sexton of the managers' church, and that he refuses to quit the premises; and whether, seeing that it is a source of annoyance to the principal teacher, he will cause inquiries to be made with the view of having the man removed to other premises.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that in 1898 the then manager of the Lixnaw boys' national school gave possession to the clerk of the Catholic church of that part of the school premises which had formerly been used, but was not then being used, as a girls' school. It appears, however, that the premises have deteriorated by reason of the clerk's occupancy, and the Commissioners are therefore taking steps for the dispossession of the clerk.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Construction.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what steps he has taken, or proposes to take, to expedite the commencement of the war vessels of this year's programme of new construction, both in the Royal Dockyards and private establishments; on what dates, approximately, does he anticipate that the one battleship, one large armoured cruiser, six fast protected cruisers, sixteen destroyers, and £500,000 worth of submarines will be laid down respectively; and will the necessary money be provided to complete these vessels at correspondingly earlier dates than were originally anticipated.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): The tenders for the new torpedo boat destroyers are now under consideration. The battleship of this year's programme will be laid down in January, and the armoured cruiser in February next. One fast protected cruiser was laid down at Pembroke in June, 1908. The tenders for the other five fast protected cruisers which are to be built by contract will be received by 5th.

November. Work on the submarines begins next month. It is not at present expected that the dates for completion will be anticipated. Any requisite money will be provided for the completion of these vessels at the dates the Board may consider necessary.

MR. ARTHUR LEE asked if it was proposed that the vessels should be completed at an earlier period so as to give the Navy as well as the unemployed the benefit arising from expediting their laying down.

MR. McKENNA said that the expediting of the large battleship and cruiser was to such a small extent that it would not materially affect the final date for completion. The Admiralty did not at present contemplate an earlier date for the completion of the vessels.

H.M.S. "Gladiator."

MR. ARTHUR LEE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what has been the total cost to date of the operations in connection with the salvage of H.M.S. "Gladiator"; whether he proposes to incur the further expenditure that would be necessary if this vessel is to be restored to a state of fighting efficiency; and, if so, what is the estimated cost of her repairs and refit.

MR. McKENNA: The total cost to date is about £54,000. The course to be taken with the vessel will be decided when the estimated cost of repairing her is known.

MR. ARTHUR LEE asked whether the Admiralty would consider whether it was worth while to spend the large sum of money necessary to restore the vessel to fighting efficiency seeing that it was already obsolete.

MR. McKENNA said that he did not accept as accurate the statement of the hon. Member, but the Board of Admiralty would of course consider all the circumstances.

Naval Pensions.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the decision to make weekly payments through the post offices of the allowances under the Old-Age Pensions Act, he will consider the advisability of paying Navy pensioners their allowances weekly also, instead of quarterly, as at present.

MR. McKENNA: I must refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to similar Questions in this House on Wednesday and Thursday in last week.

MR. CARLILE: Has any difference of opinion arisen between the Admiralty and the Treasury on this subject which accounts for the character of the Answer referred to?

MR. McKENNA: So far as I am aware, no communications have passed between the Admiralty and the Treasury on the subject.

MR. CARLILE: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the matter serious consideration in view of the reasons I have submitted to him?

MR. McKENNA: I have given most anxious consideration to the question. The boards of guardians are aware of my decision; yet so far none of them have communicated with me.

The New Battleships.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that in September a statement purporting to be issued by the Admiralty was published giving for the new battleships now building of the "St. Vincent" class the armament in guns and torpedoes, the description of gun-mountings, and the number of rounds of ammunition supplied for each gun under the different headings of armour-piercing projectiles and common and lyddite shells, together with shrapnel for the 4-inch guns; and whether he can state if the publication of these details, hitherto regarded as confidential, was authorised by the Admiralty.

MR. McKENNA: The details given in the statement to which I take my hon. friend to refer are inaccurate, and their publication was unauthorised.

Dartmouth Naval College.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will consent to the publication of the Director of Naval Education's instructions to examiners by which the present system of education of naval cadets at Dartmouth is tested; and whether the Director of Naval Education under the Board of Admiralty is responsible for the system.

MR. McKENNA: The Answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the negative. The Director of Naval Education under the Board of Admiralty is responsible for the system of examination at Dartmouth.

*MR. BELLAIRS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some of the examination questions have leaked out to the cadets? Will he give me access to the instructions to the examiners?

MR. McKENNA: I am not aware of the alleged fact that the papers have been given to the cadets. I do not believe it can be true. I cannot give the hon. Member access to the instructions.

The Special Reserve.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the present strength of the infantry of the Special Reserve in non-commissioned officers and men and how many of the men are under twenty years of age.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. HALDANE, Haddington): The strength of non-commissioned officers and men of the infantry of the Special Reserve on 1st October was 50,179, and of these 14,704 were under twenty years of age.

Attendance at Territorial Camps.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Yeomanry attended the annual camp training this year; and how many officers, and non-commissioned officers, and men respectively of the other branches of the Territorial Force attended camp for fifteen days.

MR. HALDANE: The following are the numbers attending camp for fifteen days or over—

	Officers.	Non-commissioned Officers and Men.
Yeomanry* . . . . .	1,043	20,106
Royal Artillery . . . . .	704	12,882
Royal Engineers . . . . .	295	5,864
Infantry . . . . .	2,474	56,047
Army Service Corps . . . . .	88	1,891
Royal Army Medical Corps . . . . .	161	3,192
Total, including Yeomanry . . . . .	4,765	99,982

*In addition, 13 Yeomanry Officers and 85 Non-commissioned Officers and Men attended Camp for less than 15 days.

MR. ASHLEY: Are we to understand that 99,000 men of the Territorial Force attended fifteen days in camp?

MR. HALDANE: More than that; if you include officers, 103,000.

Army Statistics.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the strength, both in officers and men, of the Regular Army serving with the colours on 1st October, 1905, and 1st October, 1908, respectively, giving in each case separate figures for cavalry, artillery, and infantry.

MR. HALDANE: Yes, Sir. The figures are too long to read out to the House, but I will have them printed with the Votes and Proceedings.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state the general effect of the figures?

MR. HALDANE: The total strength as distinguished from establishment, was, on 1st October, 1905, 182,319, and on 1st October, 1908, 166,043. The difference is largely accounted for by the reduction in the Garrison Artillery.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: Will the Return show the difference in the numbers of the Reserve?

MR. HALDANE: The number of Reservists was just now much above the normal. It is higher than in 1905.

MR. ASHLEY: Is not the increase due entirely to the policy of the late Government?

MR. HALDANE: The increase in the Reserve is in part due to the three years system.

Strength of the Territorial Army.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what was the total enlisted strength of the Territorial Army, as compared with its establishment, on 1st October, 1908.

MR. HALDANE: The figures for non-commissioned officers and men on 1st October, are as follows: Establishment, 302,199; strength, 188,781.

The Special Reserve.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the present strength of the Special Reserve, as compared with its establishment; how many of the men already enlisted in the Special Reserve have either joined, or announced their intention of joining, the Regular Army; and what approximate number of vacancies in the Special Reserve does he anticipate will be available for recruits from the ranks of the unemployed during the coming winter.

MR. HALDANE: The strength of the Special Reserve (all arms) on 1st October was 61,291, out of an establishment of 77,089. 3,951 men had joined the Regular Army by 1st October. It is not possible to say how many men intend to join the Regular Army, as they are not asked on joining the Reserve whether they intend to join the Regular Army. Taking into calculation the probable wastage, it may be estimated that there will be room for about 24,000 being gradually taken during the winter.

Army Horses.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what sums are annually provided by the United Kingdom, Germany, France, and Austria, respectively, to encourage the breeding of horses suitable for Army purposes.

MR. HALDANE: No funds are at present provided from the Army Estimates of the United Kingdom for these purposes. As regards Germany, the estimated expenditure for 1908-9 for Prussia is about £160,000, and for Saxony £11,000; the figures for Wurtemberg and Bavaria are not available. As regards Austria-Hungary, the annual expenditure is about £300,000. As regards France, about £100,000 is spent annually.

MR. ASHLEY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say definitely what steps are being taken to increase the supply of horses for the Army?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

Annual Cost of a Soldier.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the annual cost of a cavalry soldier of the Line serving at home, and of an infantry soldier, respectively.

MR. HALDANE : The average annual cost, including charges for barracks, arms, ammunition, etc., of a trained private soldier at home amounts to £61 17s. 2d. for cavalry of the Line, and £57 6s. 4d. for infantry of the Line.

Army Balloons.

MR. ASHLEY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the expenditure on balloon work in 1903-4 was £14,600, and the estimated expenditure for 1908-9 for both balloon and airship construction is only £13,750, he will state what steps he proposes to take to place this country in a position of equality with France and Germany, who are spending large sums of money on aeronautical work.

MR. HALDANE : Sufficient funds have been provided this year for such experimental work as is considered necessary. The amounts which are expended on experimental aeronautical work at the present time by Germany and France cannot be accepted as a standard of what is desirable for this country to spend.

The Cavalry.

MR. ASHLEY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why 10,349 men of the Regular Army at home were classified as cavalry soldiers on 1st October, 1907, in view of the fact that there were only 7,412 horses and mules on the regimental strength of the cavalry regiments in this country.

MR. HALDANE : Every cavalry regiment has an establishment of men in excess of that of horses—and this is the case in foreign armies. The peace establishment of horses is practically identical with the war establishment. The peace establishment of men includes recruits and other persons who for obvious reasons do not require individual mounts. The men are, however, all being trained as cavalry soldiers, and therefore are rightly classified as such.

MR. ASHLEY : But in foreign armies are there only two horses for every three men?

MR. HALDANE : I do not think that arises out of the Question on the Paper.

Weekly Payment of Army Pensions.

MR. CARLILE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the decision to make weekly payments through the Post Offices of the allowances under the Old-Age Pensions Act, he will consider the advisability of paying Army pensioners their allowances weekly also, instead of quarterly, as at present.

MR. HALDANE : Will the hon. Member kindly refer to my reply to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight Division of Hampshire on the 14th instant?

MR. CARLILE : Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to consider a general extension of the principle of weekly payment, in view of the terrible temptation to intemperance arising under the present system?

MR. HALDANE : We have extended the system very much lately in that direction. But there is a very great difference of opinion as to whether it is desired by the men themselves.

MR. CARLILE : But do not boards of guardians say it would be a great benefit?

MR. HALDANE : Well, we have enabled boards of guardians to draw the money and pay it out weekly to men who have resort to the Poor Law.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) : Is there not ample evidence at the War Office that the payment of pensions in large sums quarterly is a positive misfortune to a considerable percentage of those who receive them?

MR. HALDANE : We have dealt with those cases by enabling the guardians to pay the pensions out weekly where it is desired.

MR. BYLES : And I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that that privilege is very much appreciated.

Case of Captain E. B. Wilson.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Captain E. B. Wilson, 5th Lancers, who was gazetted in November, 1907, as placed on half-pay, was allowed to retain his appointment as Superintendent of Gymnasia, Northern Command; whether it is usual for an officer on half-pay to continue in such an important position; whether Captain Wilson regularly appeared in the monthly Army List up to and including August, 1908, as holding the appointment, though never being near the gymnasia nor performing any single duty in connection with the post of superintendent during the whole nine months; whether Captain Wilson received full pay during that period; and, if so, what action the Secretary of State proposes to take in the matter.

MR. HALDANE: He was allowed to retain his appointment up to 24th March, 1908, when he was removed from his appointment. So far as officers on half-pay are concerned, it is quite usual to give them appointments on the staff. Although he was removed from his appointment on 24th March, 1908, Captain Wilson's name continued to appear in the Army List, through a clerical error, as holding the appointment up to August, 1908. He, however, did no duty in connection with the post of Superintendent of Gymnasia after 24th March. Through an error made by the Army agents, Captain Wilson has been credited with the pay of his appointment from 25th March to 31st August. The over-issue of pay is in course of recovery.

Army Discharges and Unemployment.

MR. G. GOOCH (Bath): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the assertion that his policy of Army reduction has turned thousands of men into the streets; and whether he can inform the House how many men belonging to the disbanded units have been dismissed from the Army.

MR. HALDANE: I am aware that some highly mendacious statements to this effect have been recently made. No men belonging to the disbanded units were dismissed from the Army. Those who did not complete their service in their units were either posted or voluntarily transferred to other units or transferred to the Reserve at their own request on guarantee of obtaining employment.

London District Command.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State of War whether there is any intention to abolish the London district command; and, if so, into what command will it be absorbed.

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir. There is no such intention.

Lee-Enfield Bullet Velocity.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War seeing that a muzzle velocity of 2,600 feet per second can be obtained in the short Lee-Enfield rifle with a 150-grains bullet without exceeding the pressure which the breech action is amply strong enough to stand, why the ammunition now supplied to the British Army gives only 2,060 feet per second as against the 2,900 feet per second given by the ammunition used in the German Army and the 2,650 feet per second by that used in the United States Army.

MR. HALDANE: The pattern of cartridge is still under consideration. There are many other details to be considered besides the velocity.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many tons of pressure are exerted on the breech action of the Lee-Enfield rifle by the ammunition now supplied by the Army; and how many tons of pressure would be exerted by a cartridge giving a muzzle velocity of 2,600 feet per second.

MR. HALDANE: The present ammunition exerts a mean pressure not exceeding  $16\frac{1}{2}$  tons at  $60^\circ$ ; a cartridge giving a muzzle velocity of 2,600 feet seconds would exert a mean pressure not exceeding  $18\frac{1}{4}$  tons at  $60^\circ$  and  $19\frac{1}{4}$  tons at  $120^\circ$ . The maximum for any individual round is  $\frac{1}{2}$  ton higher in each case.

Lee-Enfield Rifles.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a muzzle velocity of 2,600 feet per second can be obtained in the short Lee-Enfield rifle without rapid deterioration of the breech bolt and without exposing the user of the rifle to serious risk of accident by the blowing out of the bolt.

I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he himself, or one of his expert advisers, will give a practical demonstration of the strength of the breech action of the Lee-Enfield rifle by firing fifty rounds of an ammunition giving a muzzle velocity of 2,600 feet per second.

MR. HALDANE: In reply to this and the next Question, I would inform the hon. Member that exhaustive trials are still in progress under the expert advisers of the Army Council.

Sisal Bulbilles.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government of German East Africa has imposed an export duty of 1,000 per cent. on sisal bulbilles in order to ensure to that Colony the exclusive advantage of an early start in the cultivation of sisal; whether such action does not necessarily prejudice the development of sisal plantations in adjoining British territory; and, if so, whether any action can be taken to procure equal treatment for British planters.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): The attention of the Secretary of State has been called to the export duty to which my hon. friend refers, and which no doubt to some extent prejudices the development of sisal plantations in British territory; but it did not appear to be a matter in which His Majesty's Government could properly make official representations to the German Government.

Settlement of British East Africa.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the natives of the adjacent lowlands of British East Africa ever affected a permanent occupation of the uplands of that Protectorate; and, if not, whether the Government proposes to give European settlers in this region such preferential rights as are usually conceded to pioneers and settlers in previously undeveloped territories.

COLONEL SEELY: I am not quite clear as to the nature or extent of the preferential rights to which my hon. friend refers. It is true that there is much land in the uplands which has not been in permanent occupation by natives, but His Majesty's Government cannot admit that the rights of the natives are confined to land which they have occupied permanently. It is the policy of His Majesty's Government to secure to the native tribes of the East Africa Protectorate such a proportion of the land which they have occupied, whether temporary or permanently, in the past, as will not only be adequate to their present requirements but will allow a reasonable margin for a future increase in their numbers; and it is only the land remaining after these conditions have been fulfilled that can be regarded as available for European settlement.

*MR. REES: Does not that include a greater part of these uplands?

COLONEL SEELY: I cannot say without notice.

British Shipping and East Africa.

MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether in view of the recommendations of the Committee on Shipping Subsidies of 1900 and of the fact that the primary objects of the German East Africa Steamship Company are to develop German East Africa and to promote German trade, in pursuance of which purposes its mail steamers call at one British, and at three German, East African ports, the Government will consider the urgent necessity which exists for subsidising a British mail service on the East African coast to serve Port Sudan, Berbera, Kismayu, Lamu Malindi, Mombasa, Zanzibar, Chinde, Beira, and Lorenzo Marquez, all of which are either British ports or serve the trade of British Colonies.

COLONEL SEELY: His Majesty's Government are anxious to secure, if possible, an improved service in British Steamships between this country and East Africa, and negotiations are in progress on the subject. I regret that I am not at present in a position to say more.

Orange River Colony Land Bill.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Bill, passed by the Orange River Colony Legislature, dealing with the employment of natives, their occupation of land and half-profit farming, was considered by this Government, and has received the assent of the Crown.

COLONEL SEELY : I have seen the terms of the Bill which has been passed and reserved by the Governor for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure, but it has not yet been formally submitted.

SIR GILBERT PARKER : Have the Government taken into consideration the fact that this Bill will practically compel the natives either to become servants in the Colony, or to retire with their cattle to the already overcrowded reservation ? Will that not impede the progress of civilisation ?

COLONEL SEELY : Different views are entertained with regard to the effect of this Bill, but I think it would not be wise for me to make a statement on behalf of the Government until the Bill has been submitted here.

British Indians in the Transvaal.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford) : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received complaints in regard to the character of the diet given to British-Indians imprisoned in the Transvaal for refusing to comply with the registration law ; and, if so, will he say what action he proposes to take in the matter.

COLONEL SEELY : Yes, Sir, the Secretary of State has received complaints and he is now in communication with the Transvaal Government on the subject.

DR. RUTHERFORD : How many men are affected by this ?

COLONEL SEELY : I should like notice of that Question.

Orange River Colony Loan.

SIR GILBERT PARKER : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Orange River Colony intends to float a new loan of £1,500,000, which will include the establishment of a fund for Dutch people in necessitous circumstances, to the amount of £750,000, together with a Government land settlement scheme representing £65,000, and a Church Industrial Colony for poor whites representing £27,500 ; and whether it is the intention of this Government to guarantee the loan.

COLONEL SEELY : The Orange River Colony Legislature passed a Bill last session to authorise a loan for £1,500,000, for various purposes, some of which are referred to in this Question. It was proposed to allocate £750,000 of this sum to the establishment of a fund for assistance by way of loans to those in necessitous circumstances, and for the promotion and assistance of farming and industrial undertakings in accordance with a resolution adopted by the House of Assembly. But there was no indication either in the Bill or in the debates on the Bill that the benefits of this loan should be confined to those of His Majesty's subjects who are of Dutch descent, and the Secretary of State regrets that the suggestion should have been made from here. There has been no official request from the Orange River Colony Government for an Imperial guarantee, and until such request is made I am not in a position to make any statement.

In reply to a remark by Sir GILBERT PARKER, the purport of which did not reach the Gallery—

COLONEL SEELY said : I at once accept the hon. Member's disclaimer. It is undesirable to inflame racial feeling in South Africa.

Animal-Traps in Lagos.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS (Manchester, N.W.) : I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the duty of 1s. each recently imposed on animal traps imported into Lagos ; whether he is aware that this duty was imposed without the slightest notice being given, and that large quantities of traps manufactured in Lancashire were actually on the sea at the time such tax was imposed; and whether he will take steps to secure the reduction of this duty, which is about 200 per cent. of the value of the articles, at all events in respect of those consignments which were dispatched from England before the notification of the duty was promulgated.

COLONEL SEELY: The duty of 1s. each on iron-toothed spring traps imported into Southern Nigeria was imposed not to raise revenue, but to check the importation of the traps, owing to the cruelty attending their use to which the attention of the Governor had been called. It is reported for instance, that round Ibadan probably from 40 to 50 per cent. of the bush-fowl shot have only one leg, the other having been torn off in a trap. I do not know what quantities of traps were actually on the sea at the time when the duty was imposed. It was imposed without notice in accordance with the usual practice, and I am afraid that it would now be impracticable to allow any traps to come in at a reduced rate of duty.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS: If representations are received from the British Consul on the subject will they be considered?

COLONEL SEELY: I must remind the hon. Member that 40 to 50 per cent. of the bush-fowl shot are found to have only one leg, and that is a serious matter.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS: Are the traps not largely used for rats?

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield) was understood to ask if like restrictions could not be placed on imports of gin.

COLONEL SEELY: That shall be considered.

South African Constabulary.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Transvaal Government Gazette of 17th July, 1908, contained the dismissal of no less than fourteen English officers of the South African Constabulary, many of whom had served their country with distinction during the war, upon the ground of reduction of establishment; whether several of those posts, in spite of the contemplated reduction, were immediately filled by Boers; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

COLONEL SEELY: Yes, Sir, I have seen the Gazette notice referred to, which was concerned with a reduction of establishment considered to be necessary by those responsible. The Question, if I may be allowed to say so, conveys a somewhat unmerited reflection on the Transvaal Government, who are alone competent, subject to the control of their Parliament, to judge of the necessity of such reductions, and who have not, I think, exhibited the animus against English officers which the Question seems to imply. The Gazette of 29th July, contains a long list of appointments under the recent Police Act, and I observe that more than three-quarters of the names, including the Commissioner, are of officers of British extraction. The hon. Member will probably admit that it is not unreasonable in reorganising a police force, which will be brought into contact with Dutch-speaking people, to appoint some officers of Dutch extraction.

SIR GILBERT PARKER asked whether the hon. Member could give the House the information which he evidently possessed.

COLONEL SEELY: I do not know what the hon. Member refers to.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said it was with reference to the Transvaal Civil Service.

COLONEL SEELY: As I stated the other day, I hope to lay a full Return in the course of a few days, about the 22nd. With regard to the information in the answer, if hon. Members will come to the Colonial Office, I shall be able to convince them of the truth of the statement therein made that the vast majority of the men now in the constabulary are Englishmen.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS: But have any posts that have been closed by retrenchment since been filled up by the appointment of Boers?

COLONEL SEELY said that the Government proposed to take no steps, and as to the retrenched officers he would be glad to give any information to the hon. Member. He was bound to point out to the hon. Member that the Chief Commissioner of Police was an Englishman who had fought throughout the war, and he had succeeded a Dutchman.

MR. JOYNSON-HICKS: If I can give the hon. Gentleman information——

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice must be given of any further Questions.

Opium Consumption in Hong-Kong.

MR. THEODORE TAYLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing that the Chinese inhabitants of Hong-Kong are afraid to form anti-opium societies because of the belief that the British authorities are opposed to such action; whether he is aware that the encouragement of such societies is one of the Chinese Government's methods of reform among their own people; and whether the Secretary of State will give instructions to the Government of Hong-Kong to encourage and aid such societies by every means in their power.

COLONEL SEELY: The Answer to the first part of my hon. friend's Question is in the negative. The attitude of His Majesty's Government on the opium question is well known in Hong-Kong, and the Secretary of State therefore sees no reason to issue instructions to the Colonial Government, but a copy of the Question and of my reply shall be sent to the Governor.

MR. THEODORE TAYLOR: Will the hon. Gentleman cause inquiry to be made as to whether there is any truth in the allegation?

COLONEL SEELY: Certainly, we will inquire.

Hong-Kong Opium Dens.

MR. THEODORE TAYLOR: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies how far the Secretary of State for the Colonies' telegraphic instructions, dated 5th May last, to the Governor of Hong-Kong to close the opium dens there have been carried into effect.

COLONEL SEELY: The Governor's proposals are under the consideration of the Secretary of State who hopes shortly to be in a position to give his decision upon them.

MR. THEODORE TAYLOR: Am I to take it that, although five months have already elapsed, nothing has been done in Hong-Kong?

COLONEL SEELY: On the contrary a great deal has been considered, and a great deal done.

The Case of Mr. Luxenburg.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to state the result of his appeal to the Russian Government for compensation to Mr. N. Luxenburg for wrongful arrest and imprisonment; and if he will take the opportunity of the presence in this country of the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs to lay before him a report of the whole case with a view to favourable consideration by His Excellency.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. J. A. PEASE, Essex, Saffron Walden): It was not possible to discuss this matter with the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs during his visit to this country; but a Note, laying the circumstances before the Russian Government, was sent last month, to which a reply has not yet been received.

Old-Age Pension Officers.

MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the appointments will be made by the Treasury of pension officers under Section 8, subsection 4, of the Old-Age Pensions Act, 1908; and whether, in view of the shortness of the time left for the necessary preliminary work by local authorities in connection with this Act, he will take steps to have these appointments made with the least possible delay.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The appointments in question were made on the 2nd instant.

Bow Trams.

MR. B. S. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has decided to issue a new licence to the London County Council to run trams on the stud system from Aldgate to Bow, as the present provisional licence was only granted for six months; and whether he is aware that the London County Council have had an expert's opinion upon the present studs, which states that even had the line been laid exactly similar to the one at Lincoln the difficulties and dangers that have occurred would have been much the same.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): No application has been received from the County Council for a renewal of the sanction provisionally given to the working of the stud system for six months. I have no information as to the matter referred to in the last part of the Question.

MR. B. S. STRAUS: Am I to understand that the Board of Trade will not give a full certificate until they are satisfied that the electric system which the London County Council intend to use is quite safe?

MR. CHURCHILL: I think I can say that—with all necessary reserve.

Copyright.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade why the proposed alterations to the Berne Convention regarding copyright have not been issued in this country by his Department; why, when information on the subject was given, it was in the form of a document printed in French and was accompanied by a request that it should be treated as confidential; whether he is aware that this document was issued as a public document by certain foreign Governments; and whether any alterations made by the Conference sitting in Berlin will be submitted to this House before being accepted by the Government.

MR. CHURCHILL: The proposed amendments to the Berne Convention were communicated to a number of societies and persons interested in the questions to be discussed, and their criticisms were invited and obtained. The proposals were naturally communicated in the form in which they were received from the International Union, but if the hon. Member so desires I will cause a translation to be issued. I was not aware that any foreign Government had actually published the document, and I do not think that such a step is in accordance with the practice generally pursued in the case of the previous Conferences. Any alterations of the existing law in this country to give effect to amendments of the Convention must of necessity be submitted to Parliament in the form of a Bill.

MR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade declined to give to persons whose interests would be seriously affected any copy of the document giving the alterations proposed to be made in the articles of the Berne Convention at the International Copyright Convention at Berlin; whether, after repeated applications, the Board of Trade gave to a limited number of persons a copy of the alterations on the understanding that it should be treated as private and confidential; whether he can state the reason why these English applicants have been given a document drawn up in French; whether the Berne officials on inquiry informed the Board of Trade that they had no objection to the Board of Trade issuing an English translation of the alterations proposed; and, as the Congress is now sitting, will he state where copies of this English translation can be obtained.

MR. CHURCHILL: Part of this Question is covered by the Answer I have just given to my hon. friend the Member for Leicester. I am not aware that a copy of the proposals has been refused to any person or body directly affected, but if my hon. friend will give me particulars of any case which he has in mind I will give the matter my consideration. The statement as to the International Bureau is not correct. The Bureau informed the Board of Trade that it was not within their competence to prescribe the limits within which the proposals should be made public, but that so far as they were aware on the occasion of the previous Conference the amendments, though known to the parties interested, were not made public in the Press before the Conference assembled.

MR. COOPER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the British delegates to the International Copyright Convention at Berlin will be given the power to decide whether the editions of foreign works lawfully produced shall be destroyed; whether they will be given the power to decide that the period of copyright in Great Britain shall be extended; and whether, if any alteration of the copyright law be agreed upon, any opportunity will be given for discussion before an Order in Council is made.

MR. CHURCHILL: The British delegates at the International Copyright Conference at Berlin have no power to bind His Majesty's Government to any amendment of the law of copyright, and it has been explained to the other delegates that any provisional assent which they may give to any proposed amendment or revision of the International Copyright Convention must not be held to imply that Great Britain will be able eventually to adhere and give effect to such alteration. The last part of the Question is covered by my previous Answer to my hon. friend the Member for Leicester.

*MR. BYLES: May we then understand that the British law as to copyright cannot be altered without the consent of the House of Commons.

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir.

The Wreck of the "Argonaut."

MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there is any Board of Trade regulation requiring passenger vessels to be provided with lifeboat accommodation for as many passengers as they are capable of carrying; and whether he is aware that the "Argonaut," which was capable of carrying 200 passengers, had on board only 108 passengers when she sank the other day, yet that all the boats were full, so that if she had had her full complement of passengers on board a large number of people would have been unprovided for; and will he say who is responsible for this state of affairs.

MR. CHURCHILL: There is no regulation requiring lifeboat accommodation to be provided for every person on board every passenger vessel, and I am advised that it would not be practicable in the case of very large vessels to carry the number of boats that such a regulation would require. The "Argonaut," however, which was certified to carry 338 persons in all, had at the survey held immediately before the last voyage boat accommodation for 378. The statement that all the boats were full, though there were only 108 passengers on board, will be investigated at the public inquiry which is to be held in the case.

Tuberculosis.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will be prepared to announce at an early date whether or not the Government is prepared to adopt the recommendations of the Select Committee on Tuberculosis as to compensation for carcasses condemned as tuberculous.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): May I also ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the demand of the Butchers' Federation from every vendor of cattle for a warranty of immunity from a disease which cannot be accurately diagnosed prior to slaughter, and to the general feeling expressed by the agricultural community that any loss incurred by them in consequence thereof should be borne either in whole by the Exchequer or, as recommended by the Select Committee on Tuberculosis of 1904, as to one-half, he will say definitely whether His Majesty's Government are prepared to entertain such a proposal, in order that the farmers may be in a position to know how to deal with this novel demand on the part of the butchers.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): May I also ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if his attention has been called to the decision of the National Federation of Meat Sellers not to buy cattle without guarantee from the farmers, and to the hardship which would be inflicted upon farmers by giving such guarantee; and if he will provide that part of the compensation for an animal condemned by the inspectors after slaughter as tuberculous shall be paid out of public funds.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): Legislation would be necessary to give effect to the suggestion made in these Questions, and I am not in a position to promise that such legislation will be proposed by the Government.

Cirencester Vaccination Case.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if a medical officer, on behalf of the Local Government Board, has inquired into the cases of children vaccinated by Dr. Cossham, of Dyer Street, Cirencester, and if he ascertained that the result of the vaccination in the case of three or more children has been to cause terrible sores, eating the flesh to the bone; and if, in consequence of these and other similar cases, the quality of the lymph supplied by the Local Government Board has been changed.

MR. JOHN BURNS: Three instances at Cirencester which called for inquiry were investigated by one of the medical inspectors of the Local Government Board. In two of them the vaccination places were long in healing, but the symptoms were not of a serious character. A large number of children were vaccinated from the lymphs used in these cases respectively without any such symptoms, and the evidence indicates that in these two cases secondary contamination of the vaccination places occurred. In the third case there was deep ulceration at the site of vaccination. This, however, did not begin to show itself till subsequently to the ninth day after vaccination, and no adverse report has reached the Local Government Board in respect of any of the thousand or more children vaccinated from the same lymph as that used in this instance, although reports are required in each case. The home of the child was insanitary and overcrowded, and it appears to be clear that the vaccination places were secondarily infected by septic material. I am not aware of any need for changing the quality of the lymph issued by the Board.

MR. LUPTON: Has not the quality of the lymph been recently altered, and will the right hon. Gentleman issue instructions that vaccination shall not be performed in unhealthy places?

MR. JOHN BURNS: In no one department has absolute perfection yet been reached, and we try to improve on the best every day?

MR. CROYDON MARKS (Cornwall, Launceston): Is the Department satisfied that in this case the unsatisfactory symptoms developed through the insanitary condition of the place?

MR. JOHN BURNS: Yes, our officers reported that the development was due to uncleanness.

Mile End Guardians Scandal.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can give the House the results of the trials of the Mile End Guardians, and the total results of the inquiries he instituted; and whether, in view of the scandals existing under the present system which he has brought to light, the Government will consider the propriety of restoring the ex-officio guardians.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I directed an inquiry by Mr. Willis, one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board, as to the proceedings of the Mile End Guardians. On receiving his Report I forwarded the papers to the Public Prosecutor, who took proceedings against two contractors and ten guardians and ex-guardians. One of the contractors was acquitted, and one of the guardians absconded. The rest were convicted; one was fined, and the others were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. The expenditure of the Mile End Guardians has shown a substantial reduction since the proceedings in connection with the inquiry were commenced, but it is not possible at present to estimate the total results of this and the other inquiries which I have instituted. The question of the constitution of boards of guardians will be a matter for consideration when the Report of the Poor Law Commission has been received.

MR. PIKE PEASE asked when the Report of the Poor Law Commission would be received.

MR. JOHN BURNS said he expected it in November or December. The Commission were very anxious to present it at the earliest possible date.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): Has the right hon. Gentleman taken any steps to ascertain from various boards of guardians throughout the country whether any similar scandals are obtaining as in the case of Mile End and Poplar, and, if so, what are the results of his inquiry?

MR. JOHN BURNS: I can assure the House that the Local Government Board is keeping its eye on every body throughout the country.

MR. H. C. LEA: Except the unemployed.

The National Telephone Company.

MR. B. S. STRAUS: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that, owing to the Government shortly completing the purchase of the National Telephone Company's undertaking, hundreds of men have been discharged; and whether he is prepared to take some action in the matter, in view of the fact that 6,000 further discharges are threatened.

The following Questions on the same subject also appeared on the paper:—

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that about 6,000 men (many of whom are resident in Glasgow) of the National Telephone Company are being dismissed by that Company on account of the fact that satisfactory arrangements cannot be made between his Department and the Company as to the taking over of plant in January, 1912; that unemployment in Glasgow is widespread, and that the addition of these skilled workmen to the number is a serious matter; and whether, in view of the fact that these workmen will be wanted by his Department at a time when they have become scattered over the country, he will make an arrangement with the Telephone Company to prevent their dismissal.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the National Telephone Company have suspended all new constructional work owing to the approaching acquisition of the telephone service by the Government, and that in consequence there have been, and will be, extensive dismissals of telephone employees, amounting before 1911 to about 6,000, according to the figures of the President of the Company; and whether some means could be devised by which the capital expenditure of the Company could be controlled by the Government during the few remaining years of the Company's existence, and the value refunded on the acquisition of the system by the Government, so as to obviate this increase to the general want of employment in the country.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): To ask the Postmaster-General whether in the negotiations that are proceeding between him and the National Telephone Company, he will secure that practically no man who is on the construction staff of the Company will be put out of employment in consequence of the pending transfer of the Company's plant to the Post Office; and whether he will also secure that no interruption shall take place in telephone construction work and that it shall be carried on so as to provide as much employment as possible.

MR. LUPTON: To ask the Postmaster-General if, in view of the fact that the Post Office will take over the property of the National Telephone Company on 31st December, 1911, and that this circumstance is leading to the discharge of members of the staff of the Telephone Company's construction department, he will himself take in hand the new construction work that is required or authorise the Telephone Company so to do, so that these men may not join the ranks of the unemployed.

MR. H. C. LEA: To ask the Postmaster-General with reference to the transfer to his Department in 1911 of the business of the National Telephone Company, Limited, whether he is aware that the latter at the present time, by curtailing their staff and refusing extensions in every direction which are urgently demanded by the public, are seriously adding to the ranks of the unemployed; whether he can state how many of the present staff, 6,000, will be retained and how many dismissed between now and when the transfer matures; and, in the latter case, whether they will receive compensation or not.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Perhaps I may be allowed at the same time to answer all the Questions on this subject. It is not a fact that the National Telephone Company have suspended their construction work; but they have stated that it is not to their interest to undertake the construction of new plant which would not be likely to be brought into use before the end of their licence; and I have been informed by them that in consequence they will find it necessary to make some reductions in their construction staff. The question of providing for the proper development of the telephone system, and the continuation of the work of construction, has received careful consideration. Under an arrangement come to in the purchase agreement of 1905, considerable systems of underground wires have been, and are being, constructed by the Post Office and leased to the Company on rental terms until 1911, so as to facilitate the due extension of the telephone system, while at the same time making provision by new construction to meet the public requirements after 1911. This policy is being pursued as actively as possible, and will to some extent meet the difficulty. I am at present discussing with the Company what further arrangements can be made, so that the necessary work of construction may be continued uninterruptedly. I may add that a special arrangement for the proper development of the telephone system in the Glasgow area by the Company and the Post Office in co-operation has been nearly completed. I understand from the Company that the discharges which have so far taken place, apart from those due to misconduct or incompetence, or to the termination of temporary employment or employment for certain special purposes, have been mainly caused by an exceptional falling off in orders obtained from the public consequent on the recent depression of business throughout the United Kingdom. Arrangements are being made to give employment in the Post Office Service to competent workmen discharged from the Company's service when they can be usefully employed. The whole question, which is a difficult one, is receiving the most careful consideration.

MR. B. S. STRAUS asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would see that the National Telephone Company did not scamp the necessary expenditure on capital account simply because of their agreement with the Government.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON replied that under the terms according to which the system would be taken over all these circumstances would be taken into account, and if the Company scamped the work they would receive less money.

MR. H. C. LEA asked whether applications made to the Company for an extension of telephonic communication were being refused daily because the system was going to be taken over by the Post Office in 1911, and whether the right hon.

Gentleman would discourage the policy of discharging men to add to the ranks of the unemployed.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that this point, as well as others, was covered. The Company so far had not found it necessary to discharge any of their constructive hands because of their refusal of orders; if men had been discharged it was through want of orders.

MR. CURRAN (Durham, Jarrow) asked how many servants of the Company had been discharged up to date, and how many of those who had been discharged had been employed by the Post Office.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that he was in communication with the Company, but as yet he had not been furnished with full information.

MR. CURRAN asked whether it was possible for the right hon. Gentleman to enter into some arrangement with the Company to prevent further discharges owing to the state of the labour market.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am in communication with the Company, and I am very anxious to do what I can to prevent discharges.

MR. WATT asked whether it was not the case that the system was at present being starved on account of the arrangements made with the right hon. Gentleman and the Company.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) asked whether it was not a fact that under the agreement of purchase there was a special provision made for the Post Office to take over the staff of the Company, and whether that clause had now come into operation.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Until the agreement comes into force the clause does not operate.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY (Paddington, N.) asked whether it was not the case that the Company were pursuing a deliberate policy of starving the system till 1911.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: That Question should be addressed to the Company and not to me.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY: Is it not the right hon. Gentleman's concern whether the service is left in a state of efficiency or not?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that any evidence brought before him to show that the service was not to be left in a state of efficiency would be considered.

*MR. SPEAKER: Any further Question must be put down.

Aberdeen Mail Service.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the dislocation of postal business which has been created by the recent action of the Caledonian and North British Railway Companies in changing the hours of departure of the evening mail trains from Aberdeen to the South; and what course he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: My attention has been drawn to this matter. The hours of these trains are not in any way under my control, but I have pointed out to the railway companies the great inconvenience to the public in the North of Scotland which has been caused by the alteration of the trains and the consequent alteration in the postal service; and I have asked them to consider whether they cannot revert to the former times of service.

North of Scotland Mail Service.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the contract for carrying the 8 p.m. night mail from London to Edinburgh and the North of Scotland is with the London and North-Western and Caledonian Railways only, or whether any portion of the contract is with the North British Railway; and, if so, can he state to what part of that Company's system the contract applies.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The great bulk of the mails for Scotland are conveyed by the special postal mail train.

which leaves London (Euston Station) at 8.30 p.m. and reaches Aberdeen at 7.35 a.m. This train is run under contracts with the London and North-Western and Caledonian Railway Companies. Some of the mails for Edinburgh and the North of Scotland are conveyed by the 8.25 p.m. train from King's Cross by the East Coast route, under the general contracts with the Great Northern, North-Eastern and North British Companies, but the hours of the train are fixed by the Companies concerned to suit their own traffic.

MR. DALZIEL: Do the North British Railway Company receive payment for carrying the mails from Edinburgh to Aberdeen?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: There is no specific subsidy for that, but there are fixed rates of payment; these give us no control over the trains.

MR. DALZIEL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the train which carries the mails from Edinburgh to Aberdeen does not stop at many important centres, the letters for which are in consequence delayed at Edinburgh six hours. Cannot an arrangement be made for it to stop and leave the mails?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not know to which train the hon. Member refers, but I shall be pleased to consider any representations he may send to me.

Central London Postmen's Duties.

MR. HART-DAVIES: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether orders have been passed which involve an attendance from 4 a.m. for the Central London postmen; and whether, seeing that the object of this change could have been equally attained by placing a comparatively small increase of the staff on midnight duty, 12 to 7 a.m., and the inconvenience caused to the general body of City postmen thus avoided, he proposes to take any action in the matter.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: In consequence of the great increase in the work, and the consequent delay in delivery it has become necessary in the interests of the public in the Eastern Central district to arrange for a certain number of men to attend at 4.0 a.m. I regret that this is necessary, but I may mention that the new arrangement affects 238 only out of the 1,356 postmen in the district, and that, as a set off, the duties generally have been greatly improved by reductions in the number of separate attendances. The object of the change could not be secured by increasing the staff on duty from midnight to 7.0 a.m. as the work for which the men are required consists largely of preparing correspondence for delivery, and must necessarily be done by the men who are to perform the delivery. Men attending from midnight to 7.0 a.m. would be off duty before the delivery commenced and much of the correspondence concerned is not received until about 4.0 a.m. If this alteration is found to operate harshly in any individual case the matter will be favourably considered with a view to affording relief.

MR. HART-DAVIES: Does the change apply to any other postal districts in London?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: No, it specially affects E.C. A large number of people desire to have their letters earlier, and there seems no possible alternative to bringing on a certain staff of men earlier.

Irish Linen Industry.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) whether he has yet been able to appoint linen inspectors for the purpose of protecting the Irish linen industry from fraud in the United Kingdom.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The negotiations with the Linen Merchants' Association are not complete, but the matter is receiving attention.

MR. LONSDALE: What is the nature of the proposals?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I cannot say now.

The Government and Unemployment.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the amount of suffering caused by the present state of unemployment, he can now state what the Government proposes to do to alleviate the distress, and when a day can be given to discuss the subject.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I propose to make a full and detailed statement on this subject on Wednesday, and as I am afraid it will be necessary for me to go beyond the ordinary limit of an Answer to a Question, I shall ask the permission of the House to make the statement at the end of Questions.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON: In view of the guillotine Motion being in operation, may I ask whether, in the event of the right hon. Gentleman's Answer not being satisfactory to my colleagues, the Government will be disposed to give us a day to consider the whole subject.

MR. ASQUITH: I am sanguine enough to hope that my Answer will be satisfactory. In the event of its not being so, having regard to the importance of the subject, the hon. Gentleman may be sure an opportunity will be given to consider it.

Scottish Education Bill.

MR. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he can say when the Report stage of the Scottish Education Bill will be taken.

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot make any announcement as to the date at present; but I hope to be able to do so next month.

Military Charges on India.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will give this House any opportunity of discussing the serious steps taken by the Government of India to charge the Indian taxpayers with an additional annual burden of £300,000 in accordance with the recent recommendation of the Committee on Army Charges.

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir. I am afraid that no opportunity for such a discussion can be provided this session.

DR. RUTHERFORD: Is it not a matter of great interest to the Empire that this extra burden should be placed on India? Ought this House not to have an opportunity of discussing it?

MR. ASQUITH: There will be an opportunity next session.

Irish Land Finance.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to make his promised statement on Irish land finance.

MR. ASQUITH: I am unable to fix a date at present. Communications are daily passing between the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I hope a definite statement may be possible before the end of next week.

The Government and Home Rule.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the statement of the President of the Board of Trade at Dundee on 9th October on the subject of Home Rule was made with the sanction of the Cabinet; and, if so, will a Bill be introduced dealing with the matter before the present Government go to the country.

MR. ASQUITH: The statement of my right hon. friend was made on his own responsibility. The policy of the Government has been clearly explained in the declarations made by me in the earlier part of the session, to which I have nothing to add.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Will it be possible for the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to come to some agreement on this important subject, in view of the unrest and unsettlement which these electioneering speeches from Members of the Government cause among the law-abiding and respectable people in Ireland?

MR. ASQUITH: I am not aware of any difference of opinion amongst Members of the Government on this subject, and I am afraid that nothing I can say will allay these feelings of apprehension and unrest.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): If there is no difference of opinion between the right hon. Gentleman and the President of the Board of Trade, does the right hon. Gentleman endorse what the President of the Board of Trade has said?

MR. ASQUITH: There is no difference of opinion.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan): Are we to take it that when a Minister makes a rash statement, silence gives consent?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said he wished to ask the Prime Minister two questions having reference to the arrangement of business under the Closure Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman intended on Wednesday to make a statement of some length on the serious question of unemployment, and, as he understood, he had promised, if that statement was not satisfactory, to give an opportunity for its discussion. A lengthy statement, made in time taken out of their rather slender resources on the Licensing Bill, was of itself a rather serious interference with the rules which the right hon. Gentleman had himself laid down. He thought it might be taken as a matter of absolute certainty that the right hon. Gentleman's statement, whether satisfactory or not, would require commentary and discussion. The second question had reference to the Amendment put down on Friday in the name of the First Commissioner of Works in connection with off-licences, about which not a single word either had been or could be said. The first opportunity of discussing it must be on the Report stage, and he would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman did not think this fact necessitated some reconstruction of the department resolution when they came to the Report stage. The interests were very large.

MR. ASQUITH said he hoped his statement would not be at all a long one. It would be longer than an answer to a Question, and that was why he said what he did. But it would be as short as he could make it, and he did not think it would substantially encroach on the time allotted to the Licensing Bill. He thought it was almost impossible that any statement on this particular matter could be made without giving rise to a legitimate demand for discussion in some quarter, and he would see how that demand could best be met. With regard to the second question of the right hon. Gentleman, he would point out that the Amendment was carried without a division, without even a challenge. That, according to ordinary experience and use, would seem to show that it had the unanimous support of the House. He had never known a proposition to which exception was taken carried without a division, or even without a challenge. But he agreed that it was a matter of importance, and he would consider, between now and the Report stage whether it would not be possible, by remoulding, if necessary, the compartment procedure, to afford the House some opportunity of discussing it if there was a general disposition to do so.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee B. (in respect of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Bill): Mr. Byles; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Acland Allen.

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee: That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee C. (in respect of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) (No. 2) Bill): Mr. Samuel Roberts; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Du Cros.

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON fur-

Prevention Bill): Earl of Ronaldshay and Mr. Thomas Lorimer Corbett; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Charles Craig and Lord Balcarres.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

CHILDREN BILL.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) moved the addition of the words in Clause 42 for the protection of children who might be sent by their parents or employers to fetch cigarettes from automatic machines. He said the words regarding the machines being "extensively used by children" were likely to give rise to a good deal of misunderstanding, as it was quite possible children might merely use them for others who were fully entitled to the use of them and not for themselves. In such a case no penalty ought to attach to the user. He, therefore, begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 4, after the word 'persons,' to insert the words 'for the purpose of obtaining cigarettes for his own use or that of other children or young persons.'"—(Captain Craig.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) thought the matter was sufficiently covered by the clause, and the insertion of these words would unnecessarily complicate the working of the Bill. As a matter of fact these machines were not extensively used by children for the purpose of obtaining cigarettes for adults. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 9, after the word 'order,' to insert the words 'Provided that any person aggrieved by such an order may appeal against it to a Court of Quarter Sessions.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said this appeal would probably be very seldom used, and for that reason it was not inserted in the Bill. But it was as well to allow the appeal, and he would, therefore, accept the Amendment.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) asked whether the hon. Gentleman would extend the appeal to Section 39 (Penalty on selling tobacco to children and young persons).

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he would consider that.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments proposed—

"In page 24, line 16, to leave out the words 'or purchase.'"

"In page 24, line 19, to leave out the words 'by whom they are bought.'"

"In page 24, line 21, after the word 'business,' to insert the words 'or was a uniformed boy messenger in the employment of a messenger company and employed as such at the time.'"

Amendments agreed to.

MR. RAWLINSON pointed out that the clause made it an offence to sell cigarettes to certain people, and the Government had made an exception in the case of uniformed messenger boys employed by a messenger company. But he thought the exemption was too narrow. A page at a club or a clerk in an office might be employed in the same way, and surely in their case it ought not to be treated as an offence. Any boy bona fide employed as a messenger, ought to be exempted, especially as, after all, the seller would supply them at his own risk. This clause as it stood would give endless opportunities for traps to be laid for unwary shopkeepers by people who might desire to get them into trouble. He hoped, therefore, the House would accept his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 21, after the word 'business' to insert the words 'or was bona fide employed as a messenger at the time.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he was sorry he could not accept the Amendment. It would open too wide a door to the evasion of the Act. If words were put in that this clause was not to apply in any case where a boy was bona fide employed as a messenger at the time every person who wished to buy cigarettes would represent that he was bona fide employed as a messenger. He might make special arrangements for messenger boys in uniform, because that was a special case and they would be known. But, looking at this from the point of view of the tobacconist, if the tobacconist knew he was not allowed to sell cigarettes to any body under the age of sixteen, the matter was comparatively simple. If he saw a boy apparently under the age of sixteen he knew he must not serve him, but if a boy in uniform came to him he could distinguish him at once and knew that he would be able to serve him. But the insertion of these words giving so wide and undefined an exemption would impose a very great burden on the tobacconist.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) regretted that the hon. Gentleman persisted in his opposition to the Amendment. It appeared to him that if the Amendment suggested by the hon. Gentleman were carried it would create a monopoly in favour of the boy messenger companies. He saw no reason why a particular advantage should be given to the boy messenger companies, or why people should be put to the trouble of sending out for a messenger boy in order to send for cigarettes when they had a page-boy in their own employment whom they kept for the purpose of running errands, and who would be in livery if not in uniform. Would it not be absurd to say that if a member of the National Liberal Club wanted a cigarette, and there was not one in the club, he must not send out one of the club pages, but must send out for a boy-messenger to buy him some cigarettes? In considering an Act of Parliament it should not be considered from the point of view that some people might desire to evade it, but from the point of view of common sense. Did the hon. Gentleman intend to move the Amendment following the one now before the House?

Because if he did it looked as if he was going to recede from the position which he had previously taken up, and was no longer going to allow anybody employed as a servant or a messenger to buy cigarettes.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the remaining words of the clause were purely consequential to Clause 41. If Clause 41 were dropped these words were entirely unnecessary.

SIR F. BANBURY asked whether, if the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend were not accepted, he would be allowed to send a servant of his under sixteen years of age to fetch him a cigarette.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: No.

SIR F. BANBURY contended that he would be able to do so if these words were not struck out. These were strong arguments in favour of the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend, and he hoped that he would press it to a division.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) thought this Amendment rather demonstrated the difficulties in which the House was placed in respect to these clauses, which tried to make a thing criminal which was not criminal. It was true that the addition of these words would make a slight addition to the risk of evasion. He did not think it would be so great as the hon. Gentleman supposed, because the boy must be a bona fide messenger, but it would somewhat add to the burden of the tobacconist. That was true, but the tobacconist was not bound to sell unless he liked, and if he had any doubt in the matter he was quite within his right to refuse to sell. If, however, something of this kind was not put into the Bill a very genuine hardship would be involved to those who could not command, by reason of their income, the services of a boy messenger, and who were not allowed to send their little boy or little girl out for a packet of cigarettes. He thought this was a serious matter, and that the Government would have done well to have accepted the Amendment. It would not have made any difference to this

Bill, and would have removed a great hardship.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) expressed the opinion that this Amendment might have been accepted if only for the reason that there were very few towns in which the boy messengers were in uniform. It would not inflict any hardship perhaps in London or other large towns in England, where the boy messengers could be found by the telephone; but there were many small towns where the little boys were just as well known to the traders as the boy messengers were here. If these words were not inserted a very great hardship would be inflicted. After all, the onus would still rest on the tobacconist. He would run the risk unless the boy was a bona fide messenger. He thought in cases of this sort, where an Amendment was intended to improve the Bill, and was not proposed in any captious spirit, it might be accepted. There were very few towns in Ireland in which there were uniformed boy messengers. The boy messengers in those places were respectably dressed, but not in a uniform, and the penalty would fall upon them, or an extra expense would fall upon them, in having to dress in compliance with this Act. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

Question put.

The House divided :—

[While the division was being taken, one of the occupants of the first row in the Strangers' Gallery rose and said: "Gentlemen, I have a petition which I have presented to the Prime Minister. I should like you to read it." He then threw a paper on to the floor of the House. He was seized by an attendant, when he added: "I have said all I have got to say." He was then removed.]

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 21, to leave out from the word 'business' to end of clause."—(Mr.
 Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that Clause 44 had been very much criticised by the hon. and learned Gentleman and other hon. Members opposite, on the ground that it included "any small cigar," and not a large cigar, and this distinction had caused some ridicule.

 He might explain that the definition had been taken from the Oxford Dictionary, and it had the authority behind it of Dr. Murray. However that might be, perhaps for the purposes of legislation it could be somewhat improved. They could not leave the definition to the Courts, and to avoid the probability of evasion of the Act, he moved to leave out the words "any small cigar made of," and to insert the word "cut." Then the clause would read "The expression 'cigarette' includes cut tobacco rolled up in paper, tobacco leaf, or any other material."

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 28, to leave out the words 'any cigar made of,' and to insert the word 'cut.'"—(Mr Herbert Samuel.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the word 'cut' be there inserted."

MR. RAWLINSON said it was somewhat difficult at the moment to follow an alteration of this kind, and the hon. Gentleman would quite see that they needed a little further explanation of what the effect of it would be. The old definition "any small cigar" might mean tobacco rolled up in paper, or tobacco leaf or any material. Now they had "cut" tobacco rolled up in paper, or tobacco leaf, or any material. Would that include any form of cigar which contained cut tobacco?

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the second subsection of the clause dealt with tobacco other than cigarettes.

LORD R. CECIL said that from the point of view of the Under-Secretary it would have been safer to omit any definition of cigarette, because the moment a definition was given they presented conundrums to the ingenuity of those who desired to evade the law, and who would devise something by which they could escape from the restrictions imposed. For that reason the Courts had always refused to give a definition of fraud, as it might exclude something at which the ingenuity of rascals might arrive. This definition might include any screw of tobacco rolled up in a paper, and bought not for cigarettes, but for the pipe, but he did not imagine that the Court would be such an idiot as to think, in spite of the words of the Legislature, that it meant cigarettes.

Question put, and agreed to.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not propose to submit the first two Amendments standing in his name, but he moved the third, to substitute the word "tobacco" for the word "cigarettes," in the last line of the clause. He did not know why the Bill proposed to apply to smoking mixtures, and he could not understand why a man should not send his child for a smoking mixture if he preferred it rather than tobacco. He supposed there were some people who smoked things which were not at all tobacco but some other mixture. He should like to know why that was to be included as well as tobacco; what was the explanation of this remarkable proposal? He begged to move.

SIR F. BANBURY seconded.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 40, to leave out the word 'cigarettes' and insert the word 'tobacco.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'tobacco' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the noble Lord would remember that the distinction between cigarettes and other tobaccos was this: that the tobacconist might not sell cigarettes at all to boys, while in regard to other tobacco he might sell it to boys if he had no reason to believe that it was for their own use. The provisions as to cigarettes were comparatively easily enforceable. The provision with regard to smoking mixtures had reference to substitutes for tobacco, not being tobacco, which were being now sold, more and more widely to boys, in halfpenny packets with a small wooden pipe. These mixtures contained more or less deleterious substances, and were very much cheaper than the cheapest cigarettes. It was that which they wished to aim at. The subject had been considered in Committee, and it was considered advisable to put these mixtures under the more complete bar imposed on the cigarette rather than in the more easily obtainable category of other tobacco.

MR. RAWLINSON said smoking mixtures were very well-known, and were usually sold in tins. He did not wish to particularise any brand, but a very large number of brands were not intended to be pure tobacco, and what was added made the charm of them. Certain substitutes, which were probably a great secret, were used, and these smoking mixtures were largely sold in tins. He was sure that nine Members out of the ten would read the words of this subsection as applying to these smoking mixtures, and certainly such a construction might be put upon them. The Under-Secretary apparently had some smoking mixture in his mind, and he admitted at once that what the hon. Gentleman had stated was new to him.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he would consider the matter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed.

"In page 28, line 6, after the word 'superannuation,' to insert the word 'recall.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) said the utility of his Amendment spoke for itself. There was considerable danger in the clause as it stood that there might be established a scheme for the payment of superannuation allowances without intervention of any higher authority. It was quite likely that pressure would be brought to bear to secure these allowances and it was only fair that some higher authority should be introduced.

SIR F. BANBURY regarded this as a valuable Amendment. In many cases great pressure was brought to bear on people in public positions to increase salaries and grant superannuation allowances, and they were not always able to resist that pressure. The Amendment would be some safeguard, and he hoped it would be accepted.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 28, line 22, after the word 'establishing,' to insert the words 'with the approval of the Secretary of State.'"—(Mr. Staveley-Hill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that this point was carefully considered before the clause was inserted, and it was decided that the Secretary of State could not and ought not to assume this responsibility. These persons who were receiving superannuation allowances were for the most part not in the public service at all but in the service of the managers of voluntary institutions, though occasionally they were in the service of local authorities, and there was no reason whatever why the Secretary of State should make himself responsible for the actuarial conditions in a private arrangement between the managers of an industrial school which belonged to a philanthropic society and the officers of the school. It was provided in the clause that the superannuation allowances should not be in excess of the amount payable under the Superannuation Metropolis Act, 1866; in order to save the managers and others from indirect pressure, and that Act provided that if the term of service was under eleven years the superannuation must not be more than ten-sixtieths, with an addition of one-sixtieth for every additional year of service, with a maximum of two-thirds of the salary. The Secretary of State could not undertake to make the elaborate actuarial calculations which would be necessary in every particular case of these officers of schools, and he was unable to accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

CAPTAIN CRAIG said he had put down an Amendment to omit subsection (1) of Clause 59, in order to elicit how far the present law differed from what was proposed in the subsection. It was a consolidating clause as well as one enacting something fresh. Was there any law which allowed any person to bring before a Petty Sessional Court a child which was found wandering or begging? And was it not such very harsh punishment as might be ordered by a Court of Petty Sessions for some of the trifling offences which were here enumerated? The clause said that any person might bring before the Court any person apparently under the age of fourteen who did so-and-so. That would be an opportunity for spite on the part of the smaller fry who were friends of the infant it was desired to have locked up. "Any person" was a very wide reading to give to such a Bill as this. Again, a young person might be brought before the Court if found begging or receiving alms. They were all thoughtless sometimes in throwing a copper to a boy, or perhaps on meeting with the son of some old servant one was apt to put one's hand in one's pocket. Was anybody to be allowed to take up that small boy to Petty Sessions for taking from somebody much his senior a small tip of 1d. or 2d? It seemed very harsh treatment, and very grandmotherly legislation, because if a person of mature years liked to act in this way the penalty ought to be on him rather than on the boy who took the coppers. If a small boy found another small boy wandering he might charge him and have him taken before the Petty Sessions. Surely, there was some loose drafting about a Bill which would allow that, and probably it would occur as much out of mischief as out of any benevolent feeling on the part of others. He did not observe that the Government had put down any Amendments to meet these obvious defects. A young person might be taken up if found wandering, and having a parent or guardian who was unfit to have the care of the child. It did not say anything about the other parent. The father might be abroad, and though the mother might have a home here, and be fit to have charge of the child, he might be brought before the Court and sent to an industrial school. Surely there was something very weak and wrong in a clause which would allow such interference as that. Then if the mother was undergoing a week's imprisonment the child was practically hidden away in a reformatory or industrial school for several years. Latterly a great number of suffragists had been imprisoned for a short time, and if anyone found one of the children of one of these women wandering about it could be brought before the Court and ordered to be sent to an industrial school. There was something wrong there, too. Had anybody, like himself, ever tried to get a boy out of an industrial school after the mother had come back from prison? It was one of the most costly and difficult proceedings that he had ever had anything to do with in his short career. In Ireland it could only be done by an order of the Lord-Lieutenant, and in order to get it correspondence had to go through so many Departments that the boy was almost an old man before he got his release. The thing was a farce in many of its particulars. Subsections (a), (b), and (c), were all harsh. Surely it was not the intention of the Government to persist in them. A great many people were in favour of prohibiting cigarette-smoking amongst youths, but surely it was not intended to tack on to a Bill to prohibit juvenile smoking such extraordinary hardships as might befall innocent boys. If parents could not keep their boys in proper order and discipline the State would not do it, and for the State to attempt to do it in cases of this sort was to interfere with parental responsibility, and would do more harm than the good which could possibly be effected by a whole Act of Parliament. If they dropped the Bill at Clause 58 they would have done very well in legislation in this direction for this session. The clause gave far too much responsibility to "any person," whoever he happened to be, and he would be no party to allowing the clause to go through without a division.

SIR F. BANBURY said that under this subsection any person who had a grudge against the parents of a child might bring them before the Court. Strife might arise between acquaintances, and any person who had a grudge against another might for spite declare they had found their child wandering, and swear that the parents were of drunken habits. That was a strong order. A man might swear that the child of John Jones was the child of a drunken person who was unfit to have the care of a child. It might be proved that John Jones was occasionally the worse for drink, but the other part of the charge might fail. Would there be any penalty against the person who had brought an unfounded charge upon which John Jones had been haled before the magistrates? The mother of an illegitimate child might be sent to prison, and upon her return find that some person who had a grudge against her had been instrumental in having got her child sent to an industrial school. He did not wish to impute that the Government were not actuated by the best motives, but he thought this clause ought to have some modification, and he begged leave to second this Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 27, to leave out subsection (1)." —(Captain Craig.)

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he was surprised that the hon. Member, before moving this Amendment, had not taken the pains to see how much of the clause was new and how much was old. The words objected to by the mover of this Amendment had been the law of the land ever since 1866. The phrase "any person" appeared also in the Vagrancy Acts and the Larceny Act. It was extremely undesirable to limit to the police the possibility of rescuing these children. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children frequently used this clause, and under it about 200 children a year were rescued by them from evil surroundings, and received the almost immeasurable benefits of the industrial schools. The Salvation Army also put this clause into operation, and they did not find any of the impossible cases referred to by the Member opposite. He was astounded that such statements should be made in the House of Commons. The provision about receiving alms, wandering, and being found destitute had been the law of the land since the year 1866. It had been urged that these were harsh penalties for such trivial offences, but they were really not penalties at all. This was a clause to enable children in bad surroundings, perhaps with criminal parents, to be rescued from those surroundings and placed in a position to obtain the start in life which the industrial school system gave. That system was built mainly upon the subsections to which the hon. Member had referred. He had been asked what the new provisions were. Paragraphs (d), (e) and the latter part of (g) were new. There were a few other minor Amendments of a verbal character in other portions of the clause. This clause was discussed most fully and thoroughly for two whole days before the Standing Committee, and under these circumstances he thought the criticisms made by hon. Members opposite were quite uncalled for.

SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said he hoped the whole of this clause would be retained. As the Under-Secretary had stated, it was most carefully considered by the Committee, and he never knew of a more searching examination of any clause. The existing law had been retained with Amendments of a desirable character, and he hoped no changes would now be made.

VISCOUNT MORPETH (Birmingham, S.) made an appeal to the mover and seconder of this Amendment to allow the clause to go through as it stood. The hon. and gallant Member had given his experience of the difficulty of trying to get a boy out of an industrial school. He was inclined to think that if he had seen the inside of an industrial school he would not adhere to his opposition to this proposal. These schools gave boys a chance of starting fairly and squarely in life, and their great success was one of the most satisfactory and striking features in the whole field of education. No part of our educational system approached anywhere near the success of the industrial schools in reclaiming a class of children who were recruited largely from the lowest class of the population, and they turned out good citizens. The Under-Secretary had given reasons why the word "person" should be retained. He did not think the cases cited were likely to arise. When a child was brought before the magistrate he had to decide whether it would be beneficial for the boy or girl

The Government and Unemployment.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the amount of suffering caused by the present state of unemployment, he can now state what the Government proposes to do to alleviate the distress, and when a day can be given to discuss the subject.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I propose to make a full and detailed statement on this subject on Wednesday, and as I am afraid it will be necessary for me to go beyond the ordinary limit of an Answer to a Question, I shall ask the permission of the House to make the statement at the end of Questions.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON: In view of the guillotine Motion being in operation, may I ask whether, in the event of the right hon. Gentleman's Answer not being satisfactory to my colleagues, the Government will be disposed to give us a day to consider the whole subject.

MR. ASQUITH: I am sanguine enough to hope that my Answer will be satisfactory. In the event of its not being so, having regard to the importance of the subject, the hon. Gentleman may be sure an opportunity will be given to consider it.

Scottish Education Bill.

MR. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he can say when the Report stage of the Scottish Education Bill will be taken.

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot make any announcement as to the date at present; but I hope to be able to do so next month.

Military Charges on India.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will give this House any opportunity of discussing the serious steps taken by the Government of India to charge the Indian taxpayers with an additional annual burden of £300,000 in accordance with the recent recommendation of the Committee on Army Charges.

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir. I am afraid that no opportunity for such a discussion can be provided this session.

DR. RUTHERFORD: Is it not a matter of great interest to the Empire that this extra burden should be placed on India? Ought this House not to have an opportunity of discussing it?

MR. ASQUITH: There will be an opportunity next session.

Irish Land Finance.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to make his promised statement on Irish land finance.

MR. ASQUITH: I am unable to fix a date at present. Communications are daily passing between the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I hope a definite statement may be possible before the end of next week.

The Government and Home Rule.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the statement of the President of the Board of Trade at Dundee on 9th October on the subject of Home Rule was made with the sanction of the Cabinet; and, if so, will a Bill be introduced dealing with the matter before the present Government go to the country.

MR. ASQUITH: The statement of my right hon. friend was made on his own responsibility. The policy of the Government has been clearly explained in the declarations made by me in the earlier part of the session, to which I have nothing to add.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Will it be possible for the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to come to some agreement on this important subject, in view of the unrest and unsettlement which these electioneering speeches from Members of the Government cause among the law-abiding and respectable people in Ireland?

MR. ASQUITH: I am not aware of any difference of opinion amongst Members of the Government on this subject, and I am afraid that nothing I can say will allay these feelings of apprehension and unrest.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.B., Thirsk): If there is no difference of opinion between the right hon. Gentleman and the President of the Board of Trade, does the right hon. Gentleman endorse what the President of the Board of Trade has said?

MR. ASQUITH: There is no difference of opinion.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan): Are we to take it that when a Minister makes a rash statement, silence gives consent?

[No Answer was returned.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said he wished to ask the Prime Minister two questions having reference to the arrangement of business under the Closure Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman intended on Wednesday to make a statement of some length on the serious question of unemployment, and, as he understood, he had promised, if that statement was not satisfactory, to give an opportunity for its discussion. A lengthy statement, made in time taken out of their rather slender resources on the Licensing Bill, was of itself a rather serious interference with the rules which the right hon. Gentleman had himself laid down. He thought it might be taken as a matter of absolute certainty that the right hon. Gentleman's statement, whether satisfactory or not, would require commentary and discussion. The second question had reference to the Amendment put down on Friday in the name of the First Commissioner of Works in connection with off-licences, about which not a single word either had been or could be said. The first opportunity of discussing it must be on the Report stage, and he would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman did not think this fact necessitated some reconstruction of the compartment resolution when they reached the Report stage. The interests involved were very large.

MR. ASQUITH said he hoped his statement would not be at all a long one. It would be longer than an answer to a Question, and that was why he said what he did. But it would be as short as he could make it, and he did not think it would substantially encroach on the time allotted to the Licensing Bill. He thought it was almost impossible that any statement on this particular matter could be made without giving rise to a legitimate demand for discussion in some quarter, and he would see how that demand could best be met. With regard to the second question of the right hon. Gentleman, he would point out that the Amendment was carried without a division, without even a challenge. That, according to ordinary experience and use, would seem to show that it had the unanimous support of the House. He had never known a proposition to which exception was taken carried without a division, or even without a challenge. But he agreed that it was a matter of importance, and he would consider, between now and the Report stage whether it would not be possible, by remoulding, if necessary, the compartment procedure, to afford the House some opportunity of discussing it if there was a general disposition to do so.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee B. (in respect of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Bill): Mr. Byles; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Acland Allen.

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee: That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee C. (in respect of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) (No. 2) Bill): Mr. Samuel Roberts; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Du Cros.

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee: That they had discharged the following Members from Standing Committee A. (in respect of the Tuberculosis (Ireland)

Prevention Bill): Earl of Ronaldshay and Mr. Thomas Lorimer Corbett; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Charles Craig and Lord Balcarras.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

CHILDREN BILL.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) moved the addition of the words in Clause 42 for the protection of children who might be sent by their parents or employers to fetch cigarettes from automatic machines. He said the words regarding the machines being "extensively used by children" were likely to give rise to a good deal of misunderstanding, as it was quite possible children might merely use them for others who were fully entitled to the use of them and not for themselves. In such a case no penalty ought to attach to the user. He, therefore, begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 4, after the word 'persons,' to insert the words 'for the purpose of obtaining cigarettes for his own use or that of other children or young persons.'"—(Captain Craig.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) thought the matter was sufficiently covered by the clause, and the insertion of these words would unnecessarily complicate the working of the Bill. As a matter of fact these machines were not extensively used by children for the purpose of obtaining cigarettes for adults. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 9, after the word 'order,' to insert the words 'Provided that any person aggrieved by such an order may appeal against it to a Court of Quarter Sessions.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said this appeal would probably be very seldom used, and for that reason it was not inserted in the Bill. But it was as well to allow the appeal, and he would, therefore, accept the Amendment.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) asked whether the hon. Gentleman would extend the appeal to Section 39 (Penalty on selling tobacco to children and young persons).

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he would consider that.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments proposed—

"In page 24, line 16, to leave out the words 'or purchase.'"

"In page 24, line 19, to leave out the words 'by whom they are bought.'"

"In page 24, line 21, after the word 'business,' to insert the words 'or was a uniformed boy messenger in the employment of a messenger company and employed as such at the time.'"

Amendments agreed to.

MR. RAWLINSON pointed out that the clause made it an offence to sell cigarettes to certain people, and the Government had made an exception in the case of uniformed messenger boys employed by a messenger company. But he thought the exemption was too narrow. A page at a club or a clerk in an office might be employed in the same way, and surely in their case it ought not to be treated as an offence. Any boy bona fide employed as a messenger, ought to be exempted, especially as, after all, the seller would supply them at his own risk. This clause as it stood would give endless opportunities for traps to be laid for unwary shopkeepers by people who might desire to get them into trouble. He hoped, therefore, the House would accept his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 21, after the word 'business' to insert the words 'or was bona fide employed as a messenger at the time.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he was sorry he could not accept the Amendment. It would open too wide a door to the evasion of the Act. If words were put in that this clause was not to apply in any case where a boy was bona fide employed as a messenger at the time every person who wished to buy cigarettes would represent that he was bona fide employed as a messenger. He might make special arrangements for messenger boys in uniform, because that was a special case and they would be known. But, looking at this from the point of view of the tobacconist, if the tobacconist knew he was not allowed to sell cigarettes to any body under the age of sixteen, the matter was comparatively simple. If he saw a boy apparently under the age of sixteen he knew he must not serve him, but if a boy in uniform came to him he could distinguish him at once and knew that he would be able to serve him. But the insertion of these words giving so wide and undefined an exemption would impose a very great burden on the tobacconist.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) regretted that the hon. Gentleman persisted in his opposition to the Amendment. It appeared to him that if the Amendment suggested by the hon. Gentleman were carried it would create a monopoly in favour of the boy messenger companies. He saw no reason why a particular advantage should be given to the boy messenger companies, or why people should be put to the trouble of sending out for a messenger boy in order to send for cigarettes when they had a page-boy in their own employment whom they kept for the purpose of running errands, and who would be in livery if not in uniform. Would it not be absurd to say that if a member of the National Liberal Club wanted a cigarette, and there was not one in the club, he must not send out one of the club pages, but must send out for a boy-messenger to buy him some cigarettes? In considering an Act of Parliament it should not be considered from the point of view that some people might desire to evade it, but from the point of view of common sense. Did the hon. Gentleman intend to move the Amendment following the one now before the House?

Because if he did it looked as if he was going to recede from the position which he had previously taken up, and was no longer going to allow anybody employed as a servant or a messenger to buy cigarettes.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the remaining words of the clause were purely consequential to Clause 41. If Clause 41 were dropped these words were entirely unnecessary.

SIR F. BANBURY asked whether, if the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend were not accepted, he would be allowed to send a servant of his under sixteen years of age to fetch him a cigarette.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: No.

SIR F. BANBURY contended that he would be able to do so if these words were not struck out. These were strong arguments in favour of the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend, and he hoped that he would press it to a division.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) thought this Amendment rather demonstrated the difficulties in which the House was placed in respect to these clauses, which tried to make a thing criminal which was not criminal. It was true that the addition of these words would make a slight addition to the risk of evasion. He did not think it would be so great as the hon. Gentleman supposed, because the boy must be a bona fide messenger, but it would somewhat add to the burden of the tobacconist. That was true, but the tobacconist was not bound to sell unless he liked, and if he had any doubt in the matter he was quite within his right to refuse to sell. If, however, something of this kind was not put into the Bill a very genuine hardship would be involved to those who could not command, by reason of their income, the services of a boy messenger, and who were not allowed to send their little boy or little girl out for a packet of cigarettes. He thought this was a serious matter, and that the Government would have done well to have accepted the Amendment. It would not have made any difference to this

Bill, and would have removed a great hardship.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) expressed the opinion that this Amendment might have been accepted if only for the reason that there were very few towns in which the boy messengers were in uniform. It would not inflict any hardship perhaps in London or other large towns in England, where the boy messengers could be found by the telephone; but there were many small towns where the little boys were just as well known to the traders as the boy messengers were here. If these words were not inserted a very great hardship would be inflicted. After all, the onus would still rest on the tobacconist. He would run the risk unless the boy was a bona fide messenger. He thought in cases of this sort, where an Amendment was intended to improve the Bill, and was not proposed in any captious spirit, it might be accepted. There were very few towns in Ireland in which there were uniformed boy messengers. The boy messengers in those places were respectably dressed, but not in a uniform, and the penalty would fall upon them, or an extra expense would fall upon them, in having to dress in compliance with this Act. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

Question put.

The House divided:—

[While the division was being taken, one of the occupants of the first row in the Strangers' Gallery rose and said: "Gentlemen, I have a petition which I have presented to the Prime Minister. I should like you to read it." He then threw a paper on to the floor of the House. He was seized by an attendant, when he added: "I have said all I have got to say." He was then removed.]

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 21, to leave out from the word 'business' to end of clause."—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that Clause 44 had been very much criticised by the hon. and learned Gentleman and other hon. Members opposite, on the ground that it included "any small cigar," and not a large cigar, and this distinction had caused some ridicule. He might explain that the definition had been taken from the Oxford Dictionary, and it had the authority behind it of Dr. Murray. However that might be, perhaps for the purposes of legislation it could be somewhat improved. They could not leave the definition to the Courts, and to avoid the probability of evasion of the Act, he moved to leave out the words "any small cigar made of," and to insert the word "cut." Then the clause would read "The expression 'cigarette' includes cut tobacco rolled up in paper, tobacco leaf, or any other material."

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 28, to leave out the words 'any cigar made of,' and to insert the word 'cut.'"—(Mr Herbert Samuel.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the word 'cut' be there inserted."

MR. RAWLINSON said it was somewhat difficult at the moment to follow an alteration of this kind, and the hon. Gentleman would quite see that they needed a little further explanation of what the effect of it would be. The old definition "any small cigar" might mean tobacco rolled up in paper, or tobacco leaf or any material. Now they had "cut" tobacco rolled up in paper, or tobacco leaf, or any material. Would that include any form of cigar which contained cut tobacco?

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the second subsection of the clause dealt with tobacco other than cigarettes.

LORD R. CECIL said that from the point of view of the Under-Secretary it would have been safer to omit any definition of cigarette, because the moment a definition was given they presented conundrums to the ingenuity of those who desired to evade the law, and who would devise something by which they could escape from the restrictions imposed. For that reason the Courts had always refused to give a definition of fraud, as it might exclude something at which the ingenuity of rascals might arrive. This definition might include any screw of tobacco rolled up in a paper, and bought not for cigarettes, but for the pipe, but he did not imagine that the Court would be such an idiot as to think, in spite of the words of the Legislature, that it meant cigarettes.

Question put, and agreed to.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not propose to submit the first two Amendments standing in his name, but he moved the third, to substitute the word "tobacco" for the word "cigarettes," in the last line of the clause. He did not know why the Bill proposed to apply to smoking mixtures, and he could not understand why a man should not send his child for a smoking mixture if he preferred it rather than tobacco. He supposed there were some people who smoked things which were not at all tobacco but some other mixture. He should like to know why that was to be included as well as tobacco; what was the explanation of this remarkable proposal? He begged to move.

SIR F. BANBURY seconded.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 24, line 40, to leave out the word 'cigarettes' and insert the word 'tobacco.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'tobacco' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the noble Lord would remember that the distinction between cigarettes and other tobaccos was this: that the tobacconist might not sell cigarettes at all to boys, while in regard to other tobacco he might sell it to boys if he had no reason to believe that it was for their own use. The provisions as to cigarettes were comparatively easily enforceable. The provision with regard to smoking mixtures had reference to substitutes for tobacco, not being tobacco, which were being now sold, more and more widely to boys, in halfpenny packets with a small wooden pipe. These mixtures contained more or less deleterious substances, and were very much cheaper than the cheapest cigarettes. It was that which they wished to aim at. The subject had been considered in Committee, and it was considered advisable to put these mixtures under the more complete bar imposed on the cigarette rather than in the more easily obtainable category of other tobacco.

MR. RAWLINSON said smoking mixtures were very well-known, and were usually sold in tins. He did not wish to particularise any brand, but a very large number of brands were not intended to be pure tobacco, and what was added made the charm of them. Certain substitutes, which were probably a great secret, were used, and these smoking mixtures were largely sold in tins. He was sure that nine Members out of the ten would read the words of this subsection as applying to these smoking mixtures, and certainly such a construction might be put upon them. The Under-Secretary apparently had some smoking mixture in his mind, and he admitted at once that what the hon. Gentleman had stated was new to him.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he would consider the matter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed.

"In page 28, line 6, after the word 'supervision,' to insert the word 'recall.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) said the utility of his Amendment spoke for itself. There was considerable danger in the clause as it stood that there might be established a scheme for the payment of superannuation allowances without intervention of any higher authority. It was quite likely that pressure would be brought to bear to secure these allowances and it was only fair that some higher authority should be introduced.

SIR F. BANBURY regarded this as a valuable Amendment. In many cases great pressure was brought to bear on people in public positions to increase salaries and grant superannuation allowances, and they were not always able to resist that pressure. The Amendment would be some safeguard, and he hoped it would be accepted.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 28, line 22, after the word 'establishing,' to insert the words 'with the approval of the Secretary of State.'"—(Mr. Staveley-Hill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that this point was carefully considered before the clause was inserted, and it was decided that the Secretary of State could not and ought not to assume this responsibility. These persons who were receiving superannuation allowances were for the most part not in the public service at all but in the service of the managers of voluntary institutions, though occasionally they were in the service of local authorities, and there was no reason whatever why the Secretary of State should make himself responsible for the actuarial conditions in a private arrangement between the managers of an industrial school which belonged to a philanthropic society and the officers of the school. It was provided in the clause that the superannuation allowances should not be in excess of the amount payable under the Superannuation Metropolis Act, 1866; in order to save the managers and others from indirect pressure, and that Act provided that if the term of service was under eleven years the superannuation must not be more than ten-sixtieths, with an addition of one-sixtieth for every additional year of service, with a maximum of two-thirds of the salary. The Secretary of State could not undertake to make the elaborate actuarial calculations which would be necessary in every particular case of these officers of schools, and he was unable to accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

CAPTAIN CRAIG said he had put down an Amendment to omit subsection (1) of Clause 59, in order to elicit how far the present law differed from what was proposed in the subsection. It was a consolidating clause as well as one enacting something fresh. Was there any law which allowed any person to bring before a Petty Sessional Court a child which was found wandering or begging? And was it quite fair to inflict indictable, they had no power to whip where it was not. That seemed to have been taken away from them by an oversight. An Industrial Schools Bill passed the House of Lords in 1889, but for some reason or other never came into this House. That Bill gave the magistrates ample powers for dealing with the children brought before them, but it did not include this power. After its introduction in the House of Lords, however, a petition very extensively signed was got up for presentation to the House of Lords and to this House should the Bill reach this House. That petition was presented to the House of Lords by the then Archbishop of York, and was signed by five Courts of Quarter Sessions and no less than fifty chairmen of Petty Sessions throughout the country, and was in favour of whipping for non-indictable offences. So great was the weight behind that petition that the House of Lords in the following year brought in a Juvenile Offenders Bill which passed through the House, and which included this very alternative. If his Amendment were accepted it would make these alternatives really operative. His object was to enable magistrates to order the whipping of boys for non-indictable offences. The law as it now stood was somewhat peculiar. When a boy took apples from the ground and ran away with them he could be ordered a whipping by the magistrates; but the boy who climbed the tree, really the more serious offence, could not be ordered a whipping by the magistrates. He begged to move.

MR. RAWLINSON seconded.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 59, line 36, to leave out the words ‘or any other.’”

Question proposed, “That the words ‘or any other’ stand part of the Bill.”

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the noble Lord had correctly stated the purport of the clause, which did not confer any powers on anybody at all; it was merely a summary of possible ways in which children might be dealt with by the Court before which they were brought. The clause indicated various sorts of punishment, but it conferred no new power in addition to those which a

Viscount Helmsley.

Court of Summary Jurisdiction now possessed. But the Court would have the advantage of seeing, in a single page of an Act of Parliament, the various courses which it was possible for them to pursue with regard to a particular child. The noble Lord's Amendment would not in the least effect the purpose he had in view. This Bill did not touch the question of corporal punishment at all. When he brought it in, there were two subjects which he was determined as far as possible to avoid. One was alcohol and the other flogging. He felt that to insert either in the Bill would give rise to considerable controversy. Therefore, save as to one minute point, not worth mentioning, he did not alter anything in the present law with regard to corporal punishment. Some hon. Members had requested him to abolish the existing power of the Courts to inflict corporal punishment in the case of children; others urged that those powers should be extended. In a matter of such great controversy, he thought it far better to leave the law as it was, and if the noble Lord had any desire to amend it he might introduce a private Bill. The Amendment would not attain the ends its mover had in view, while on the other hand it would spoil the clause, which was a table showing the various courses which might be taken under this Act in dealing with a child.

SIR F. BANBURY pointed out that (g), on page 60 said “by ordering the offender to be whipped.” He understood the Under-Secretary to say that the Bill had nothing to do with whipping.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: No further powers.

SIR F. BANBURY: The result of provision (g) would be to order a whipping. The hon. Gentleman stated that he had avoided the questions of alcohol and flogging, but he presumed that by subsection (g) whipping could be ordered, and that if his noble friend's Amendment were adopted it would defeat his object, namely, to enable the magistrates to order a boy to be whipped. Therefore, he asked his noble friend not to press his Amendment. The hon. Gentleman would perhaps correct him if he was wrong, but it would appear that by the law as it stood a boy could be whipped if a magistrate so ordered.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY said he must confess that he was rather influenced by the observations of his hon. friend the Member for the City of London. He had not been clear, nor did he think many hon. Members had been clear, as to what was the effect of the clause as a whole, but, in the circumstances, he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment. But he would ask the Under-Secretary whether, putting aside all questions of flogging, he did not really think it a reasonable provision. It was not an argument as to whether whipping, as a whole, should be abolished, but whether in certain cases the magistrates should not have further discretion. There was a petition which had been signed by fifty-four chairmen of petty sessions—

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The noble Lord refers to the petition of 1861.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY: No, 1890.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: A Bill was introduced in 1900 for that very purpose, but it was so strongly opposed in both Houses that it had to be dropped.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 61, line 1, after the word 'custody' to insert the words 'and care.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 61, line 33, at end, to add the words, 'Where it is intended to bring before a petty sessional Court a person apparently under the age of fourteen as coming within one of the descriptions mentioned in subsection 1 of Section 59 of this Act, and it is necessary that accommodation should be temporarily provided for him, a place of detention may be used for his accommodation until he can be brought before such a Court.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR F. BANBURY said he would like the hon. Gentleman to give them some explanation of this particular Amendment.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said places of detention were provided under the Bill for children who had to be kept in custody when not bailed, or when not released on bail, instead of being kept in the police stations. Similarly, children remanded by the Courts were to be kept in these places instead of being remanded to a prison. But there was a case which was overlooked that might arise under Section 59 (1) referring to children sent to industrial schools. A child might be found wandering, destitute and helpless, and be a proper subject to be brought before the Court and sent to an industrial school. What was to be done with him during the day or two days which might elapse before he could be brought before the Court? At present he would be kept in the police station. They wanted to avoid that. A place of detention was already provided for the other classes of children, and this should be used in the case he suggested. Therefore, he proposed to insert this Amendment here.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. RAWLINSON moved to leave out subsection (2) of Clause 112. The subsection, he said, was for the establishment of juvenile Courts, a new experiment; and it was provided by the subsection that, when a child was charged in the juvenile Court, only those concerned in the case were to be present and the public were to be excluded. He presumed that it was desired to avoid publicity. But if that were so, the remaining part of the subsection seemed to be extraordinary, because it said that bona-fide representatives of newspapers or news agencies should not be excluded. By this provision they took away a power of that kind which might exist in a particular Court, and while none of the public were to be admitted the Press were to be present—a course which would defeat the object of avoiding publicity. He should like an explanation from the Under-Secretary as to the object he had in view, and why he drew a distinction between the public, who were to be excluded, and the Press, whose representative might send reports to the local papers, doing much more harm to the child than would arise from the presence of people who were attracted to Courts of petty sessions by curiosity.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood), in seconding the Amendment, said the course proposed by the Bill was exactly calculated to defeat the object of the Government. No doubt the object was to prevent, in the interests of the child, a crowd of people from going to see what might be very painful and disagreeable, but for his part he would greatly prefer the exclusion of the representatives of newspapers and news agencies. He really did not understand the principle on which the people were excluded and the representatives of the Press admitted, because the effect would be to spread publicity over a wider surface than could possibly arise from the presence of a few people in the back of the Court.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 63, line 21, to leave out subsection (2).”—(Mr. Rawlinson).

Question proposed, “That the words down to ‘the’ in line 24, stand part of the Bill.”

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammersmith) said it was one of the great principles of English justice that it should be free and open, and that the public as a rule should be admitted. He would suggest that it should be an entirely discretionary power.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said this was a clause which extended to England the principle of juvenile Courts, which was rapidly spreading all over the world. Originating in America and Australia, it was now being adopted in Germany and other countries, and had already voluntarily been adopted in Birmingham and some other towns in England and always with very great advantage to the administration of justice in the case of juveniles. It was the very essence of the idea of juvenile Courts that they should have as much privacy as possible. A juvenile Court was a place in which magistrates, as a rule specially chosen for their qualifications in this regard, gave their decisions in cases in which children alone were charged with offences. They wanted to get away from the whole character and surroundings of the ordinary police Court, from the criminal atmosphere and the somewhat unsavoury public that attached to and frequented the ordinary Court of Summary Jurisdiction. They wanted to get away from the procedure in which the poor terrified child was placed high up in a dock, surrounded by numbers of police and with a crowd of persons in the background, too frightened to tell the truth or to understand what was being said, and completely uninfluenced by the proceedings. What was desired was that in a sort of parental way the magistrate should come into close personal relations with the child and speak to him in a more human fashion than was possible in the ordinary surroundings of a police Court. That could only be done if the general public were not allowed to throng these Courts. The clause provided that the parties, the solicitors, counsel, and other persons directly concerned in the case, should have an absolute right of attending, and other persons should have a right of attending if the Court so gave leave in a particular case, but the general public should be excluded for the reasons he had given. From the point of view he had just been mentioning, of the general character of the juvenile Court, it did not matter if one or two reporters were there, while from the point of view of the administration of justice it was essential that the Press should have a right in all cases to be present. The newspaper reporters were the eyes of the nation, and if they were not there they could never be sure that in particular cases possibly some injustice might not be done. Therefore he was unwilling to permit the exclusion of the public to extend so far as to exclude also the representatives of the Press, and for these reasons these words were inserted in the Bill. The hon. Member for Norwood assumed that the purpose of the clause was to prevent a child being marked and known as criminal. That was not the purpose of the clause. It did not matter very much to the child whether his name was in the newspapers or not. What mattered was whether the friends and relations knew he had been before a Court of Justice. If they knew, it mattered very little indeed whether the outside public knew or not. From that point of view he did not think this limitation on the privacy of the Court was open to objection, and he trusted the House would permit the clause to remain as it stood.

MR. COCHRANE said that as to the advisability of juvenile courts there was no difference of opinion whatever. The late Home Secretary had taken steps to secure that the trial of children should take place in private. The hon. Member considered that children under certain circumstances would be too frightened if the public were admitted. That might be so in some cases, but, on the other hand, there were many hardened little offenders who appreciated advertisement, and in permitting the Press to attend, they would be gratifying that very taste which the hon. Member would wish not to allow to be cultivated. But it was a fundamental principle that the public should be admitted to the Courts. The hon. Member admitted that, to a certain extent, by admitting the public by special leave. Why could he not extend the same provision as regarded the Press? Why should it not be left to the magistrate to decide whether the Press should be admitted? It was not at all desirable that various incidents in these delicate cases should be made public, and if the public were excluded, the Press would give wider publicity to these delicate details. He supported his hon. friend's Amendment.

*MR. HORRIDGE (Manchester, E.) said the clause as it stood seemed to put the House in rather a difficulty, because on the one hand one had a very strong feeling that the right of the public to be present in some form or other ought to be retained, and one also felt that the publicity one wanted to avoid in regard to children was put in perhaps its most objectionable form. The suggestion that it should be left to the magistrates was one which was most undesirable. His view of the matter was that upon the whole the right of the public to have some audience was more important than the question as to whether or not a particular child would suffer by publicity. He quite agreed with the first half of the section, because the terrorising of the child by treating it as if it was in a Court and not in a room was avoided, and the right of the public to know what was going on was preserved. On the whole, he thought the Government were right.

CAPTAIN CRAIG said he should certainly support the Amendment. It was most necessary to be cautious in new legislation of this kind, that the public should have the opportunity of studying for themselves if they cared to do so, how juvenile Courts worked. He had in his mind cases where injustice might possibly be done accidentally by the public being excluded. It was very difficult sometimes to find out exactly what case was going on in the Court, and anyone not directly interested in the case was not allowed in. It was just possible that some good-hearted person who was excluded would, if he had been allowed in the room, have decided to take charge of one of the children which would otherwise have been sent to an industrial school, and thus the clause would defeat the end of making the future life of the child as comfortable as possible. He did not think the Court would be overcrowded by the class of persons indicated by the Under-Secretary. The public as a whole were very sympathetic in any case where sympathy was to be extended, and no unnecessary noise or applause was ever allowed. The more difficult it was made to commit children to these homes, the better. The children would be practically unknown to the public which would not take very much interest in reading the cases, and they would sink into oblivion as soon as they were tried. Therefore an increasing inducement might possibly be held out to the magistrates to commit boys straight off to a home. It was an advantage to many of these homes to have boys committed to them, and the more difficult it was made the better. They got a Government grant, and he understood in Ireland there was only one industrial home that ever had to submit its annual report and statements of accounts to any Government auditor. The consequence was that the more boys they got into these homes the larger grant they got, and they turned it into a business transaction. The Bill would be an improvement if this were struck out.

SIR F. BANBURY said the hon. Member for East Manchester had made an admirable speech in favour of this Amendment. He put his arguments very clearly; he was surprised to hear him wind up his speech by saying that he was going to support the Government. In Clause 118 they had already provided for all the evils which the Under-Secretary anticipated. They had been told that as long as the parents knew what was going on, it did not matter about the public knowing. In that case what harm could be done by accepting this Amendment, because the damage to the reputation of the child would have been done by the publication of possibly garbled or inaccurate reports in the Press. More harm might be done by the Press than by allowing a few people to remain at the back of the Court. For those reasons he should support the Amendment.

*MR. REES said there seemed to be a consensus of opinion that subsection (2) was sound, and the only doubt was as to whether the Press should be excluded. It was too late in the day to discuss whether the Press should be excluded. The Press had been described as "the eyes of the nation," and if this proviso were omitted he did not think it would conduce to the popularity of the Bill. In Montgomeryshire he was sure the exclusion of the Press would be very much objected to by those who wanted, for good and sufficient reasons to watch the working of the Act. The Press representatives when appealed to were always very willing to exclude anything that it was undesirable to publish, and he did not think the representative of any decent newspaper would wish to publish anything prejudicial to the future life of a child. Besides if the Press nowadays wanted to get hold of anything they would get it, and, therefore, it was much better to give them proper facilities. It might be said of the newspapers, as was said of one-half of their readers—

"If she will, she will, you may depend on't.
If she won't, she won't, and there's an end on't."

MR. RAWLINSON said the hon. Member opposite had misunderstood the position, because the Press and the public would still be at liberty to attend the Court. The point was that the public ought to be admitted to this new Court. They had been talking quite casually about taking children away from their mothers, but there was no better lesson to be given to the public than to be present in Court, as he had often been, on occasions when orders had been made. The magistrates ought to be carefully watched by the public, and he submitted that this was a most reasonable proposal.

MR. GOULDING (Worcester) said the Under-Secretary had given as a reason for the retention of this subsection that similar transactions had taken place in Germany and the United States with beneficial results. He had also argued that if the public were left out the magistrates would adopt a different tone than they would if the public were admitted. It was also stated that if the Court was practically empty the magistrate would be inclined to adopt a paternal tone. He had a greater opinion of the Bench than to think that they would be influenced in that way, because he was sure they would deal with all cases on their merits. It should not be over-looked that this Bill dealt not only with children but with youths up to the age of sixteen, and instead of leaving the question of publicity to the magistrates, Parliament was laying down that the public should be excluded. He believed in both the Press and the public being present. Many of the children would be wayfarers, with no one to look after them and no relatives as parties to the case. He much preferred the safeguard of open Courts and publicity. If there was anything likely to arise in a case in regard to which publicity was undesirable, the magistrate could be allowed to clear the Court, but in the vast majority of cases there would be no cause for alarm. He hoped his hon. friend would press his Amendment to a division.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) said his hon. friend had covered most of the objections to this Amendment. He would like to know why the members of the Bar were to be excluded from these Courts. It was important that barristers, who would no doubt take a special interest in defending cases in which children were concerned, should have free access to such Courts, but under the provisions of this section the members of the Bar, if not immediately concerned or retained in connection with the particular charge being tried, would be excluded from the Court.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The Court may give leave.

MR. CARLILE said the magistrates could clear the Court without this provision.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: They have no power to do that now.

MR. CARLILE said he knew that they had cleared the Court again and again. He had not heard that they had exceeded their power in doing so. Why should they pass a special provision which would exclude members of the Bar from the Court? It was in every way desirable that those gentleman should have access to the Court from the educational point of view and that they should have the opportunity of learning the nature of the difficulties which surrounded child life. He sincerely hoped on that ground that the Amendment would be accepted. It was also most desirable that police court missionaries should have access to the Court, because they were interested in the reclamation of those who had gone wrong, and also in preventive work in relation to young persons. Why should Parliament at this time of the day hamper and hinder the police court missionaries, who were hand in glove with the bench in preventive and reclamation work? Surely it could not be necessary under this Bill to exclude from the Court missionaries and charitable persons who would be likely to render aid in the case of children.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: It does not.

MR. CARLILE said that unless the Court missionaries were in the case they could be excluded from the Court under this objectionable provision. The magistrates ought to have a free hand in the matter. He thought a strong case had been made out against the retention of the section. He hoped the Under-Secretary would accept the Amendment. This was not a party question, and he appealed to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen to support the Amendment, which went a long way towards providing for the welfare of the children concerned.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) hoped the Amendment would be accepted. He did not think sufficient consideration had been given by the Under-Secretary to the question which had been raised.

He admitted that the intention of the Government was good, namely, to exclude from the Court of Summary Jurisdiction any element of sensationalism, to do away with curiosity, and not to minister to the baser minds of a sensation-loving public. But there was something far more important than that. This was a new experiment, and it was absolutely necessary that the public and the Press should have an opportunity of judging what that experiment was doing. What opportunity would they have if the proposal of the Government were adopted? In establishing such a Court as this, which made a demand on the good feeling and commonsense of the community, it was absolutely necessary that the community should be convinced. If the Court were established under the proposed conditions there would immediately be created doubt and anxiety in the minds of the public generally. They were at the very beginning of this experiment, and it seemed to him that the Government were taking the worst possible course in excluding from the Court influences which could only be for good. The hon. Gentleman said the magistrates had no power to clear the Court. He would have received the support of hon. Members on that side of the House if he had suggested that that power should be given to the magistrates in this particular case.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that the magistrates had only power to clear the Court in case of disturbance.

SIR GILBERT PARKER asked whether he was to understand the hon. Gentleman to say that the magistrates had no power to clear the Court except in case of disturbance.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the magistrates had no power to say that the public should not come into Court. In the Children's Court at Birmingham they were only able to exclude the public by persuasion.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said that was exactly what he wished to arrive at. Did he understand the hon. Gentleman to say that if in a case tried in the juvenile offenders Court it was deemed desirable in the public interest that the unpleasant circumstances connected with it should not be stated in open Court, the magistrate would not have the right to say to the people in the Court, "You must leave." If that was so, the hon. Member had not taken the right course. The Government ought to have trusted to the discretion of the magistrates. They had always conducted the Courts of this country with singular discretion, tact, and good judgment. The Court proposed to be established ought to have over it the supervision of honest and sincere public opinion. He did not believe that one in a thousand would go to Court to hear children tried, except from sympathy with them in their miseries and shame. It was desirable that the public should be able to learn from day to day through the Press of the evils which the Court was intended to deal with effectively. Reference had been made to the children's Courts in the United States. These Courts had proved most successful, but he did not understand that they were on the same basis as the Court proposed by this clause. In this case the magistrates were tied down to impose the strict penalties which the Bill provided for, while in the United States Courts the Judges had almost absolute discretion. The two things were not on all fours, and the hon. Member was not well advised in referring to the United States Courts to justify this particular proposal.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL expressed the hope that the Amendment would not be pressed. He felt convinced that if the Amendment were accepted and the subsection omitted, the object they had in view would be completely defeated. Many of his hon. friends took the keenest interest in this particular subsection, but they had not spoke in defence of it, merely because they wished to economise the time of the House. He knew that generally on that side of the House his action would be deplored and condemned if he accepted the Amendment. In order to induce hon. Members not to press it, he would not move the next Amendment standing in his name to insert the word "special." He hoped that would remove some, if not the whole, of the objection to the clause. There was an understanding that the discussion on the Report should finish and the Third Reading be taken by 8.15, and also that some Amendments to the Prevention of Crime Bill should be considered. He appealed to hon. Members to allow the division to be now taken.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
Rawlinson and Mr. Carlil.

MR. RAWLINSON moved to leave out in Clause 113, the words "or young person." The clause actually prevented anyone under the age of sixteen from being present in a criminal Court. He thought the Government would see that that was carrying restrictive legislation too far. He could understand that children under twelve or thirteen years of age should be prohibited from being present at the trial of certain cases; but though he was as strongly in favour of protecting the morals of young persons as anyone could be, it was going too far to prohibit young persons from being present in Court during the trial of other persons.

LORD R. CECIL said it surely could not be intended to exclude all young persons from criminal Court proceedings. He had always thought that to take schoolboys to listen to the proceedings in selected criminal trials was the finest instruction which could be given to them; and therefore it would, in his opinion, be a thousand pities to exclude young persons up to the age of sixteen from listening to and witnessing such trials. Of course no one would allow them to be in Court in certain cases, but their exclusion should be left to the discretion of the Judge.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 63, lines 34 and 35, to leave out the words 'or young person.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that there was a good deal of force in the Amendment. The clause as it stood might operate harshly in preventing young clerks from attending criminal trials. In all the circumstances he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments proposed—

"In page 64, line 19, at beginning to insert the words 'In addition and without prejudice to any powers which a Court may possess to hear proceedings in camera the Court may.'"

"In page 64, line 21, to leave out the words 'the Court may.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendments agreed to.

*MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) moved the omission of Clause 118, which relates to the prohibition against pawns being taken from any person under fourteen years of age. Pawnbrokers were not, he maintained, engaged in a business which could be regarded as either wicked or which was detrimental in any sense to those interested in it or to their customers. In many respects pawnbrokers were properly described as the bankers of the poor, and it seemed to pass an unmerited censure upon them to make it appear that a child, apparently under fourteen years of age, who went into a pawnshop to pawn something, was going into a place where he or she could only find evil. It was very hard, if the father was in bed, if the mother who had to look after younger children could not send a child under fourteen years of age to the pawnbroker to provide for the immediate needs of the family. It could not be argued that there had been any evidence accumulated to show that the pawnbroker had been an influence for evil in child life. He believed he was correct in saying that in those cities where there were children's Courts pawnbrokers had been publicly thanked by the magistrates for their assistance in the detection of crime. He was well aware that in the Committee attempts were made to make this clause more stringent than it was, but those efforts were defeated. He was also aware of the strong opposition of those engaged in the pawnbroking trade to anything on these lines. He thought the care of the children and their proper rights, and safeguards for them, could be very well met without this clause becoming part of this Bill. Therefore, he begged to move its omission from the Bill.

Mr. FELL formally seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 65, line 1, to leave out Clause 118."—(Mr. Claude Hay.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL said there was no intention, of course, by this clause to place any stigma on the trade of the pawnbroker. It was a respectable trade, sanctioned and controlled by law. At the same time, Parliament had long recognised that it was a trade that provided a means of easily disposing of the proceeds of a theft. For many years past, under the Pawnbrokers Act of 1872, pawnbrokers had been prohibited from having any dealings with children under twelve, though so far as London and Liverpool were concerned the age was sixteen. It was originally proposed in this Bill to make sixteen the universal age, but that had been met with a great deal of opposition in the Committee, and it was finally decided to make the age fourteen, and leave it sixteen in London and in Liverpool. He might further point out that the pawnbroking trade had no objection to this clause. The Pawnbrokers' Association offered no opposition to it. Under those circumstances he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. RAWLINSON, in moving the omission of Clause 119, said that this was the last Amendment that he should propose to this Bill, and for that reason, if for no other, he hoped the Under-Secretary for the Home Department would accept it. He ventured to submit that this clause went much further than any clause ought to do in taking children away from their parents under these particular circumstances, namely, that if the parent went from place to place in the pursuit of work and the child failed to get proper education, a constable should have power to arrest the parent and punish him and take the child away altogether. That seemed to him particularly harsh. There was the case of a mother who, in all probability, was very fond of her child and treated her well, but who, from the profession she followed, travelled about the country—it might be with a circus or as a hawker, or led a nomadic life of that kind. Owing to that, she was unable to have that child educated as well as it should be, but at the same time she was on perfectly friendly and affectionate terms with the child, and the child was on perfectly affectionate terms with the parent, by whom it was well treated. It was under those circumstances that that child of perhaps six or seven years of age was taken away altogether from the parents and placed in one of these schools. He submitted that that was harsher treatment than was merited by the parent. Yet, if this Bill passed, the child was to be taken away altogether. It was an extremely harsh piece of legislation. The House, he knew, would have been against him if there had been a question of immorality or improper conduct on the part of the parent, as was shown at an earlier period of the Bill. But in a case such as he had suggested it was a monstrous thing to take a child away from its parent and shut it up in an industrial school for good and all. This clause dealt with a class that might not have too many friends, but who at the same time were sincerely attached to their children, and who tried to bring them up as respectable citizens. Under these circumstances he begged to move the omission of the clause.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY seconded the Amendment. He thought this was a clause which ought not to be allowed to pass, and hoped it would be withdrawn from the Bill. Parliament ought to be very careful in a matter of this kind. The House must remember that this class was an inarticulate class, and that whatever injury they might suffer at the hands of the House, the House would never hear a word of it. It seemed to him to be a very strong order to say that because a person wandered from place to place in pursuance of his trade or avocation, and took his child with him, the law should be allowed to step in and say that the child was to be taken from him. That seemed to him to be one of the most interfering projects of legislation that had ever been proposed. It could not be a question of such tremendous magnitude as to make it a matter of importance. The Under-Secretary might be able to give the House some statistics on the matter, but he did not think the number of children who evaded education in this way was so great as to make the matter a very important one. It must be remembered that they were not dealing with a bad class of people. In fact they were good people, and people who had great ideas of bringing up their children properly. In point of fact, he had noticed that children of this class had very often a greater regard for their parents, and a greater conception of their responsibility to their parents, than children of other classes seemed to have. Nobody could say, as a whole, that these children were badly brought up or suffered from having a lower standard of education than those children who had a permanent residence in a town. After all, there were other forms of education than that given in the elementary schools of the country, and some of these children obtained a far more valuable education through their mode of life and were taught how to maintain themselves in life in a far better way than the children of the schools. Hon. Members ought to ask themselves whether the advantage to be gained by the clause was sufficient to counter-balance the great injury which it was going to inflict upon the parents of the children themselves. That it would inflict a great injury, nobody would deny. He hoped, therefore, the House would consider the matter very carefully before they passed such a clause as this.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 65, line 7, to leave out Clause 119."—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the hon. Members who moved and seconded this Amendment had entirely misconceived the purpose of the clause. This was not a clause to enable the children of vagrants to be sent to an industrial school; that was the law now. This clause was on the contrary intended to obviate that and to provide an alternative by which vagrant children could be rescued. The problem of the vagrant child was one of the most difficult problems to be solved. They must be rescued—although it was quite true there were only a few hundred of them. It was well-known that vagrancy was a most prolific source of crime. It was perfectly certain that vagrancy, so far as children was concerned, was in many cases an apprenticeship to crime and there was nothing which those interested in questions of child welfare desired more than that this problem should be solved. He agreed that it was harsh to step in and say to a person: "Because you are a vagrant your child shall be taken away from you," but that was the law under the Industrial Schools Act, which said that children found wandering and not under proper care and guardianship should be brought into the industrial schools. Proper guardianship had been interpreted to mean that a person of the tramp class, without any permanent abode, might not be a proper guardian for his child. Indeed circulars had been issued by the Home Office to that effect in order to clear up the doubt in the minds of certain magistrates. This section of the Industrial Schools Act had not been put into operation very largely, because a child could not be sent to an industrial school unless the local authority would pay for it. Local authorities very naturally said: "Why should this child, who is merely passing through our county, be educated and kept by us for four or five years?" One could not blame the local authority, and the question was what other course could be adopted, so far as these children were concerned. It had been a matter of very great anxiety to him in framing this Bill. To say that they must go to an industrial school was to relieve that parent of all responsibility, because it was impossible to collect the contribution from the vagrant parent, for the reason that the child having been got into the school, when it was desired to collect the contribution, it was found the parent had wandered away. The clause no doubt did repeat the present law with regard to industrial schools, but it brought in a new and alternative machinery. It applied the machinery of the Education Acts to these cases. It was necessary to adapt the machinery of the Acts in order to make it applicable to and enforceable in these particular cases, for those Acts contemplated a stationary population, and were useless in the case of parents who wandered with their children through the areas of a series of education authorities. The home worker was not allowed to keep his child from school, and in the same way it was proposed to punish these men if they deprived their children of the benefits of elementary education. So far as taking the child away from the parent was concerned, that was not a new provision, and, as was the case at present, it would be rarely enforced. The Government believed that the result of the clause would be that these children would be left with some relative or put out to board in some way, as showmen now dealt with their children. It was the vagrant alone, who carried his child from place to place, whom this clause would touch. It was the only practical way of dealing with the problem.

VISCOUNT MORPETH said the Under-Secretary had hardly been so convincing as he generally was with regard to this Amendment. The hon. Gentleman proposed to repeat a law which was already in operation. His (Viscount Morpeth's) point was that when it had been discovered that a particular course was futile in the first place, there was no utility in repeating it. To repeat it did not make it any more efficacious, it simply clogged machinery with one more useless piece of mechanism. The hon. Gentleman called in another bit of machinery, viz., one of the provisions of the Education Act, for the enforcement of education, through the attendance officer. But that was not likely to be more efficacious than the other system. The hon. Gentleman had told the House that a great many people now slipped through the compulsory clauses of the Education Act. Everybody knew, for instance, that there were a large number of people resident in the great cities who were always moving from house to house. No sooner had the attendance officer scheduled them as being in one district than they moved into another, and it was notorious that by this method, large numbers of children escaped the compulsory provisions of the Education Act, although resident in great cities. How was it possible that the children of vagrants moving all over the country could be caught by the attendance officer? There would be no onus on any local authority to do this, because they would not be desirous either to find accommodation, or to provide for children who did not belong to their district. Earlier in the afternoon he had supported the hon. Gentleman because he recognised that where parents were vicious or immoral it was only right that the State should step in and remove the child from the parent who, by his vice and immorality, had rendered it necessary. But these persons whom they were now dealing with had not committed any crime or done anything sufficiently bad to render it necessary that these children should be taken from them. Although there were bad people amongst them, and although a vagrant life must facilitate crime, it was not proved that these people were so bad, that their children should be taken from them. He hoped the Government would give a friendly consideration to this Amendment, as he thought the Government were going too far by this clause, by which it was proposed to remove children from the custody of their parents when it could not be proved that the parents were doing the least harm to their children.

MR. MACLEAN (Bath) did not for a moment deny the kindness of the motives which actuated the mover and seconder of the Amendment, but he did not think they quite realised the difficulties of the problem with which the clause sought to deal. It was intended by this clause to get at that section of the vagrant class who habitually ill-treated and neglected their children. To show that this was a real problem, he pointed out that during the past few years the Society for the Protection of Cruelty to Children had had to deal with 35,000 children, who had been severely ill-treated and neglected by those who were in charge of them. In many cases the persons who had the control of these children were not the parents at all, but persons who had hired them and hawked them about all over the country. Not long ago there was a little girl about seven years of age who had only one leg. She was discovered, probably in a common lodging-house, by a vagrant who had only one arm, who thought it would be a very happy combination for extracting the sympathy and financial support of the public. What did he do? He took the little child he had picked up for some consideration with him, and ultimately it was found with its stump exposed, and after, at an examination, to have suffered from horrors which could scarcely be alluded to. That man was sent to prison for twelve years. Another case was that of a woman who was taking her own child about the country. The condition of that child was too vile for comment. Its head was a moving mass of vermin. There were other cases which might be mentioned. He admitted that what was in the mind of the mover of the Amendment was that these cases were already efficiently dealt with, but that was not so. These children must be rescued before they arrived at that condition, and they could be rescued. That was the problem with which they had to deal. It was not dealt with by the present law, and this was the most effectual way of dealing with it. He earnestly hoped, in view of what the Under-Secretary had said, and of the general information before the House, that all would help to save this class of children from the suffering to which they were unnecessarily subjected at the present time.

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) associated himself with those who moved and seconded this Amendment. He thought it was a most drastic thing to say that a man who was moving about the country in a caravan, it might be with his children, should be arrested because his child could not spell "receive." It had been held by a magistrate in London that if a child misplaced the vowel in the word "receive" he had not an efficient elementary education, and he thought that such a drastic clause as this should never be passed by a British House of Commons. Clause 12 dealt with every possible case of parents who exposed, ill-treated, or neglected their children, or caused unnecessary suffering in the way to which the hon. Member for Bath had referred, and therefore this provision was not necessary for that purpose, as the parents were already liable to two years' imprisonment. The hon. Member dealt with this, as if in cases in which parents were fond of their children and their children were fond of them, it was not a great hardship to snatch a parent from a child or vice versa, because the child had not got this elementary education. The question was what was elementary education, and who was the proper person to give it? Was it some youth or girl acting as a pupil teacher, with a class of fifty children in an overcrowded school-room, or was it for the mother of the child to give it under circumstances in which fresh air could be obtained? There was in these days of sanitary reform a movement to procure for children fresh air, and how could the child be better off or happier than going about the world with its parents? What did a little smattering of the A. B. C. or of arithmetic which a child got in schools, and which was frequently forgotten, matter, unless the knowledge was kept up afterwards? Here they were going to snatch these children from parents who, no doubt, had an honest mode of life, which prevented them from stopping in towns and sending their off-spring to school regularly. Where mother and child had lived together for a number of years, they were often "bound up in each other," and to take an infant away from a parent under those circumstances might be very serious indeed. If the child went to an industrial school the parent did not know what sort of treatment it was given. In some of these schools there was a great deal of stick. There was a good deal of talk about the birth rate declining, but it seemed to him that if they persecuted the parents of children in this way, it was likely to lead to a still further decrease of it. Then there was a good deal of talk about population aggregating in towns, but this would make it impossible for parents except in towns to have their children educated. The scientific experience of the last thirty years taught us not to separate the parents from the children if we could help it, although he knew there was a certain school of thinkers who thought that the parent was the very worst person to have the charge of a child of their own, but he did not think the hon. Gentleman who had so cleverly and courteously conducted this Bill through the House was one of that sort. He hoped he would accept the Amendment.

*MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan) thought they were dealing with a very difficult problem. This clause recognised no distinction between very different kinds of people, but in fact there was a great difference between, on the one hand, itinerant dealers and those who lived in "houses on wheels" (caravans, etc.), and on the other hand, the abject wanderers they too often encountered in the high-ways and bye-ways of our land. They did not want to see these vagrants carrying children around the country with them who were wretched and dirty, but it seemed to him that the clause went much too far, especially for a penal clause. While he thought the country was bound to see that every child had some education, he thought this clause went too far, and as it was so stringent he should be compelled to vote for the Amendment.

Amendments proposed—

“In page 68, line 10, after the word ‘Act,’ to insert the words ‘except an offence under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.’”

“In page 69, after the word ‘child,’ to insert the words ‘or young person.’”—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendments agreed to.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he had undertaken when they reached the definition clause to bring up a definition of “intoxicating liquor,” and he begged, therefore, to move as an Amendment a form of words adapted from the Licensing Acts, and which he had not been able to put on the Paper.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 71, line 15, at end, to insert the words ‘The expression “intoxicating liquor” means any fermented, distilled, or spirituous liquor which cannot according to any law for the time being in force be legally sold without a licence from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.’”—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. BOWLES asked whether that definition excluded all patent medicines or preparations of that kind? He understood that some of these preparations were fermented and many of them were distilled and could not be sold otherwise than with an excise licence.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said he did not think that these would be included, but he would consider the point and, if necessary, deal with it.

Question put, and agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange) said the next Amendment was a drafting Amendment. Some objection had been taken in Committee to the drafting of the subsection dealing with summary jurisdiction in regard to children, the Act of Parliament for Ireland being slightly different from the corresponding Act in this country. He moved an Amendment to leave out subsection 7, and to insert another subsection which would make the law similar in both countries.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 77, line 23, to leave out subsection (7), and to insert the words: '42 & 43 Vict., c. 49. 47 & 48 Vict., c. 19. (7) References to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, shall, save as otherwise provided in this subsection, be construed as references to the Summary Jurisdiction over Children (Ireland) Act, 1884, and the reference to Section 10 of the first-mentioned Act shall be construed as a reference to Section 4 of the last-mentioned Act. 14 & 15 Vict., c. 93. The reference to the provisions of the first-mentioned Act with respect to recognisances to be of good behaviour shall be construed as a reference to the provisions of the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, with respect to recognisances to keep the peace. The reference to the First Schedule of the first-mentioned Act shall not apply. For the provisions of this Act giving power to make rules under the first-mentioned Act, the following provision shall be substituted: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland may make rules regulating the procedure of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act, and other matters incidental thereto, and all rules so made shall be laid as soon as may be before both Houses of Parliament.'"—(Mr. Cherry.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments proposed—

"In page 79, line 37, after the word 'Board,' to insert the words 'for Ireland.'"

"In page 80, line 39, after the word '1907,' to insert the words 'or any of those Acts.'"

"In page 81, line 29, after the word 'Board,' to insert the words 'for Ireland.'"

"In page 81, line 32, to leave out the words 'district board,' and to insert the words 'managers of a district Poor Law school.'"—(Mr. Cherry.)

Amendments agreed to.

MR. CHERRY next moved an addition to Clause 132, having reference to the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, and said the Amendment which he submitted was suggested by reason of certain alterations which the House had made in Clause 26. The General Evidence Act, 1898, did not apply to Ireland; therefore, it was necessary to make the law as to evidence exactly the same in Ireland as it was in England.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 81, line 37, at end, to add the words: '61 & 62 Vict., c. 36. The reference to the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, shall not apply, but in any proceeding against any person for an offence under Part II. of this Act, or for any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, such person shall be competent but not compellable to give evidence, and the wife or husband of such person may be required to attend to give evidence as an ordinary witness in the case, and shall be competent but not compellable to give evidence.'"—(Mr. Cherry.)

Question, "That these words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendments proposed—

"In Schedule 3, page 85, line 3, in the third column, before the word 'In,' to insert the words 'Subsection 1 of Section 5 from the words 'and if the young person is a male,' to end of subsection.'"—(Mr. Cherry.)

"In Schedule 3, page 85, lines 16 and 17, to leave out the words 'before he is sent to such reformatory school, and to insert the word 'as if he or she had been sworn.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Amendments agreed to.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the hour being near for private Bills, he would only formally move the Third Reading, expressing at the same time his deep gratitude for the favour with which the Bill had been received by the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a third time."

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) said he raised no objection to taking the Third Reading at the present moment. He would not trouble the House with any eulogy, but he should like to refer to the manner in which the hon. Gentleman opposite had conducted this Bill both through Committee upstairs and through the Report stage. By his courtesy and lucidity of explanation the Under-Secretary had been enabled to get this very long measure successfully through both these stages, and they were all very glad indeed to think that it would find its place in the Statute Book. It was never a Party measure. There were three or four clauses which they thought created new offences and to which they had objected, but so far as the Bill as a whole was concerned, it was a measure of which they thoroughly approved.

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said he should have had pleasure in voting for the Third Reading of the Bill if it had not been for the terrible penalties with which it was disfigured. Clause 12, for instance, dealt with the offence of not giving adequate food or clothing or lodging, or not calling in medical attendance, for which a person might be sentenced to two years imprisonment. It might be right to punish people for some failure in their duties, but it was not right to punish them to this extreme severity. In the 19th century they made great advance in the treatment of these offences, and reduced the scale of punishments to a great extent. He thought that they sometimes forgot that this was the 20th century, and, in drafting Bills, framed penalties of the most awful and terrible and horrible kind for offences committed by their fellow creatures. If this penalty were two months instead of two years it would have been quite sufficient. It would be very useful if every one of the Members of that House were sent to prison for two months—one month of ordinary imprisonment and the other month of hard labour. [AN HON. MEMBER: You would go.] He dared say some of them would not come out alive; but he should be willing to sacrifice himself if the others also went to gaol and the very fact of their having had the experience would he hoped lead to Bills not being disfigured with these horrible and terrible sentences, which were a disgrace to the age and to civilisation. He made these remarks in the hope that someone would recollect there were persons who objected to these drastic penalties, and were determined to oppose them. He could not find it in his heart and conscience to support a Bill which had such terrible penalties, and which reminded him of the middle ages and not the 20th century. He thought the Bill was intended to promote feelings of love and gentleness, and that the penalties should have been of a milder character, but for the reasons he had given he most respectfully objected to the Bill.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

WHITE PHOSPHORUS MATCHES PROHIBITION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) moved the Second Reading of the White Phosphorus Matches Prohibition Bill, and expressed the hope that hon. Members would allow it to pass this stage, as it was a measure which had the approval of all sections of the House.

Motion made and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he had no objection to the Second Reading being taken at the present moment. He thought it was a very desirable measure, but if there had been time he would have liked the Home Secretary to explain one or two points which arose, though they could be dealt with later. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman had been able to make some terms with the owners of patents, so that in future matches could be made by all match-makers without white phosphorous, and the particular privilege would not be given to certain firms. These were points on which he wanted to be assured, and he understood that the right hon. Gentleman was in a position to give him an assurance. As far as he was concerned he raised no objection to the Second Reading.

MR. CLAUDE HAY said he did not want to prevent the Second Reading being taken, but they wished to have an opportunity for discussion. Would the right hon. Gentleman commit the Bill to Committee of the Whole House?

MR. GLADSTONE said he thought that it would be more convenient if the Bill were sent upstairs in the usual course. The points to which the right hon. Gentleman referred would receive consideration, but he hardly thought it necessary to occupy time with them at present.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Standing Committee.

LONDON AND DISTRICT ELECTRICITY SUPPLY BILL [LORDS] (BY ORDER).

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir H. KEARLEY, Devonport) moved: "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to insert in the Bill a provision conferring purchasing powers on the London County Council. That any person affected by such a provision shall be entitled to be heard before the Committee upon any petition presented not later than 22nd October." He said the House would remember that the debate on the Second Reading was somewhat prolonged and animated, and the opportunity did not occur for the Government to deal with this question upon that occasion. It was part of the arrangement that this Instruction should accompany the Bill upstairs to the Committee, hence it had been thought necessary for him to move it at this juncture so that the Bill might get to the Committee without any further delay. He was not inclined to discuss the details of the Bill, indeed he thought he would be out of order in attempting to do so, because the measure had been ordered a Second Reading. The Instruction itself was extremely simple, and dealt with a single point of substance, namely, that the Committee should insert in the Bill a provision conferring purchasing powers upon the London County Council. He would recall to the minds of hon. Members what happened in the early spring in relation to these electric Bills. They received an invitation from another place to nominate a certain number of members and set up a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons to consider these Bills. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then at the Board of Trade, was unable to advise the House to accept that invitation, and he made it clear that the reason he tendered that advice was that he thought it was all important that they should retain their freedom and remain untrammelled, so that when the Bill came back from the Lords they would have full freedom to deal with it in any way they thought fit and proper, and that was the reason why they refused to join the Lords Committee. As the House knew the Lords Committee gave these Bills a long and careful consideration, and the proceedings lasted thirty-one days. The London County Council were represented, and they urged that they should be named in the Bill as the purchasing authority. That was strongly resisted by the promoters of the Bill, and their opposition prevailed, for although the Lords favoured purchase, they left the purchasing authority indefinite. He thought that justified the wisdom of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in declining to commit the House, as they would have been committed, had they accepted the invitation from another place to appoint a joint committee. The position was now changed, because the promoters had been told that the Government would give the Bill no support unless they accepted this mandatory Instruction, and their terms had been accepted by the promoters. He begged formally to move the Instruction standing on the Paper in the name of the President of the Board of Trade.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to insert in the Bill a provision conferring purchasing powers on the London County Council. That any person affected by such a provision shall be entitled to be heard before the Committee upon any Petition presented not later than 22nd October."—(Sir H. Kearley.)

MR. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford) moved an Amendment to leave out "the London County Council." and insert "a central authority composed of representatives of the municipal authorities owning their electrical supplies within the area covered by the Bill." He said he had listened attentively to the speech in which the hon. Baronet had moved his Instruction, and those who had taken part in the previous stages of this Bill would be quite aware that the statement was absolutely accurate about the amount of feeling which was exhibited on the Second Reading, and also that considerable feeling still existed in the House in regard to this measure. He must say that he expected that the hon. Baronet would have given them some better reason for the attitude of the Government. They had put down a mandatory instruction, and they had told the promoters that unless they were prepared to accept it the Board of Trade could not support this Bill as they did on the Second Reading. He thought the House was fairly entitled to have some reason given from the Board of Trade as to why they had put down this Instruction in the specific terms in which it appeared on the Paper. However, as the hon. Baronet had not thought fit to give them that information—thinking no doubt, that those who had taken such a deep interest in this question were fully conversant with all the issues involved—he would try, in a short space of time, to give to the House a few of the reasons why he proposed the Amendment standing in his name. All those who were conversant with London and Greater London as well as the areas affected outside Greater London, which would be taken in under this Bill, realised that they were not there this evening discussing anything in connection with a small measure. Under the title of a private Bill they were discussing a measure which had received the sanction of the Government, and which, for good or for evil, would affect perhaps one of the largest areas of congested population that it was possible for any measure of this kind to affect. They ought not for a moment to fail to realise the vast importance of this question. For some reason or other the hybrid Committee of 1906 to which the Bill promoted by the London County Council was referred recommended that the London County Council should be the purchasing authority, but they did so under certain conditions. He supposed the whole of the case of those who supported this instruction rested upon the recommendation of the Committee of 1906. He was fully prepared to give to that Committee and its deliberations all the consideration they deserved, but he thought it was only right the House should know that in the division upon that instruction only eight members of the Committee took part, five being for and three against it. He invited the House seriously to consider what this instruction meant, and what would be the effect upon the great area dealt with under the Bill. First of all, the London County Council governed an area of something like 117 square miles. This Bill extended far and away beyond that area, and he thought his friends on the London County Council had a fair amount of confidence when they asked the House to give to a body governing an area of 117 square miles, and consisting roughly of 130 members, the control over the huge area contained in this instruction. The area under this Bill was three times larger than the London County Council area. It was composed largely of authorities who had created their own municipal supplies, and he always thought that Progressives were strongly in favour of encouraging municipalities in this direction. There were three areas in his own division which had their own municipal supply. They had installed electric lighting and electric trams, and they did not want to come within the area of this Bill. This measure would introduce the competition of a large private concern in those three areas to which he had referred, without giving them any representation. It was quite a new theory for democrats that they should have no right whatever of representation on the body which might, under certain conditions, come in and purchase the whole of the undertaking they had created. The three areas he had mentioned contained 14,311 acres, and a population of 58,519, who would have no representation whatever on this new body. The three places he referred to were Bexley, Dartford, and Erith, which were just on the outer ring of London. The population of those districts was rapidly increasing, and by the time this Bill came into operation they would be one of the most populous portions of the outer ring of London. To those areas they were going to deny the right of control over the authority set up in this Bill, and there would be no security for the huge enterprises which had been created in those areas by the funds of the ratepayers. This was being put forward as a democratic policy. They were going to say to them: "We deny you any right—any control—over that authority which is to be set up. You are going to have no authority over the huge enterprises which you by your energy and ability, and the funds of your ratepayers, have created." And that was the policy which was advanced as a democratic policy. Gentlemen who opposed that policy were twitted with being retrogressive. If it was retrogressive, he was delighted to be retrogressive in this particular matter. He knew it would be said that they were forgetting one thing. This Bill at present was to be handed over to the hands of the London County Council. He admitted that at present it was only the London County Council area which was referred to, but hon. Members knew that there was going to be a larger London some day. Probably there was, but he had never yet heard that there was to be a larger London which was to cover anything like the area which this Bill covered. The Metropolitan police area extended to a radius of fifteen miles from Charing Cross, and that was generally taken as the area for greater London. But what did this Bill do? It included the borough of Gravesend. Did his hon. friends hope that they were going to take it into London? The Bill took in the small county borough of Croydon, which had a population of 133,000. It said: "We are going to absorb you, and you are going to have no voice." Surely his hon. friends who were Progressives on the County Council had not forgotten their bitter experience over the water undertakings. Were they like the Bourbons to learn nothing? It was their policy which had landed London in the position it was in with regard to water. It was because they would not meet the municipal authorities in a proper manner; they thought they could extend themselves and absorb everyone else, and the result had been that after a long struggle on their part they failed to convince this House that they should be entrusted with the area of the Water Board. This Bill went far outside of that. So much for the larger London of which they would hear a good deal. He had read the debates, and he was delighted to find the strongest possible arguments in support of his present contention in the speeches of his hon. friends. Let the House consider for a moment the extent of some of the areas proposed to be absorbed by this Bill. He thought very few Gentlemen except those who were deeply interested in this question had really read this Bill and informed themselves with regard to the populations involved in it. The Bill took in areas of 51,947 acres in Essex, with a population of 708,696; of 32,414 acres in Kent, with a population of 214,563; of 25,232 acres in Surrey, with a population of 286,521; and of 52,671 in Middlesex, with a population of 600,168. These were the areas that were to have no representation, although in many cases they had bought up their own supply, with great benefit to themselves. These were the figures to-day. What would be the figures including outer London a few years hence? The population of Greater London might be taken at between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000. He was not pledging himself to a hundred thousand more or less. There was not a speaker who had supported this Bill who had not dwelt on one thing, and that was that there was going to be before long in Greater Outer London—if that term might be used—a population of between 12,000,000 and 15,000,000. He did not care which figure they took. Parliament was being asked in this instruction to say that, by the time the Bill had matured for purchase, the population within the area of the London County Council was

one. It was not reasonable to expect the House to legislate for the representation of borough councils fifty years hence. It was quite reasonable to say that the County Council or some other body named by Parliament should exercise these powers, but it was impossible at present to say how the borough councils were to be represented. The difficulty was that if they made the borough councils the purchasing authority they would only have a part of the area represented, because he thought it was only about half the borough councils who had electrical undertakings in their hands. Another difficulty was that under the present law it would be almost impossible for the borough councils to buy out even the distributing agencies, because there was so much overlapping that the cost of buying out would be absolutely prohibitive, owing to the fact that under the Electric Lighting Acts allowance had to be made for severance, and as a result of that it was quite certain that they would have to have some central body. He personally felt it was very difficult to imagine a central body administering electric power and electric lighting schemes unless it was directly elected. They had been told the Water Board was a parallel case. He did not think it was, because after all the Water Board administered water, which was a universal want, and they would probably never reach the day in London when electricity would be used by everybody. Anyhow it was a long way off. But everybody must use water. He imagined even if hon. Members drank alcohol they occasionally washed. He expected the electors of London would not allow an indirectly elected body to charge the rates with the enormous capital expenditure which would be necessary to buy out the existing electric companies, and especially this bulk supply, and for that reason they must have a directly elected central body. His own feeling was that it ought to be the London County Council. Hon. Members had made rather too much of the point that it was not fair for the London County Council to go outside its own area. After all there was a precedent for it. Although the borough councils in London did not supply consumers beyond their borough boundaries it was quite a common thing in the provinces for boroughs to get power to supply gas, water, and even electricity beyond their boundaries, by agreement. This Bill did not propose in any way to compel outside authorities to take the electricity of this bulk supply company, and he therefore thought it would be quite safe to constitute the London County Council as the purchasing authority. At the same time he hoped the Amendment suggested by his hon. friend the Member for Dulwich would be accepted. If, however, it was not, he should certainly vote for the instruction of the President of the Board of Trade, because he thought it was most necessary that there should be some central body in London which should take an interest in the organisation of electric supplies, and which should take a comprehensive view of the whole matter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. CHURCHILL, Dundee) thought the House would feel that, whatever might be thought or said about the London and District Bill on its merits and as a main proposition, this debate had been conclusive with regard to the special point before the House. From almost every quarter of the House they had had speeches on the subject of who should be the ultimate purchasing authority and those who had followed the debate would, he thought, agree, if they were forced to choose between the proposition he had put forward and the proposition advanced by his hon. friend the Member for Dartford, that there was, even among all the tangles of London electricity, one problem which was settled. The hon. Member for Dulwich had suggested an addition to the instruction he had put on the Paper, namely, that they should say the County Council "or some other authority to be fixed by Parliament." He did not see any grave objection to those words in themselves, but he would recommend the House not to adopt them. The Government were seeking by this instruction to indicate a general policy for the future. They were seeking to affirm a principle which would certainly govern these Bills so far as they might progress, and which might govern other Bills if these Bills should not reach maturity. What was that principle? It was a large and simple principle. It was that ultimately, and, for his part, he hoped as soon as possible, there should be one combined, extensive, uniform system of electrical supply for London—for the Metropolitan area—and that the supply should be under the control of the government of London. That was the large, general proposition, and, however they might differ—and the subject was so complicated and vexed, and there were so many cross-currents in it that any man might be pardoned for differing from another—he had the greatest respect for those who took a different view from that which he had put forward—however they might differ upon the main question, surely all those who, from every point of view, would wish to champion the general and large progressive interest of London government could unite in pointing to the London County Council as the future main authority over the electrical supply. He was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman opposite who last spoke and who represented the opinion of the ruling force on the London County Council at the present time, speak no less strongly in support of the prerogative of that great body to be the authority entrusted with this duty than his hon. friends behind him who had spoken. It was not only a question of providing for an authority which was to administer the electrical supply of London when the purchase clauses matured. They had to think of the interval, and they were proposing to assign to a public body purchase rights over a private undertaking, and those rights did not operate until a good number of years had passed. What a safeguard it was to the public interest to vest those rights clearly and unmistakably in a powerful and existing public body, and not to leave it to an embryonic creation which had not yet come into being, something vague, which a Parliament of the future might possibly or might not select or create. How much better it was to have some powerful, trusty custodian of such purchase rights as were secured by the Bill and would ultimately operate. And he was bound to say that when they came to the special question of the merits of the Amendment he felt even greater confidence. As had been pointed out his hon. friend had shown in his speech the vice of his Amendment; he had supported representation on high democratic grounds, and yet by his Amendment he would exclude nearly half the districts concerned from any share in his proposed representation.

MR. ROWLANDS: Not necessarily.

MR. CHURCHILL said it was so because the Amendment was to substitute for the London County Council "a central authority composed of representatives of the municipal authorities owning their electrical supplies within the area covered by the Bill." There were seventy-seven local authorities within the area, and of these, thirty-five did not own electrical undertakings and so would not be represented at all. The hon. Member had allowed these to slip from his memory, though among them were the City of London, Westminster and Paddington, a great part of central and of southern London. His hon. friend asked the House to create a purchasing body in preference to the London County Council, which would be less representative, less responsible, less competent than the County Council with its experience and ever-growing skill and capacity. This new body would have no rating power, a special statute would be required to effect the purchase, and even if all the difficulties were surmounted, a body would be created that would be but a bad imitation of that Water Board which had been severely criticised on both sides of the House. The question had now been discussed at some length, and he suggested that the House should come to a decision upon the Amendment so that other aspects of the question might be raised by his right hon. friend the Member for Islington and others.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) said he intended to support the Amendment of his hon. friend the Member for Dartford. If the outside areas were compelled to come into this scheme, then they ought to be represented. Those who represented the London County Council seemed to have forgotten the main bone of contention. He happened to be on the Committee which considered the last Bill dealing with the subject promoted by the London County Council. It was proposed under that Bill, as was proposed on this occasion, that the London County Council should be the authority, but they failed. This was the fourth time they had tried to endow London with an adequate bulk supply of electricity, and he would tell the House that if this Bill were before it with the name of the London County Council on it the measure would receive the same opposition from the hon. Member for Dartford and his friends. What were the facts with regard to the area described by the hon. Member for Dartford? The administrative county of London constituted the most important area of supply; and according to the census of 1901 the county population was 4,500,000, whilst the population of the remainder of the area of supply was only 1,800,000. His hon. friend the Member for Dartford proposed to substitute for the London County Council a central board formed by the municipal and other authorities owning their electrical supply within the area covered by the Bill. Did he call that a democratic body? What had he done for the areas not represented by such places as Dartford? The capital expenditure in the county of London was represented by something like £18,000,000, while that on the area of supply outside the county, including Dartford, was only £2,700,000. This would give a good idea of the respective areas involved in this great question. The London County Council had every reason to safeguard the interest of the areas within London, because they had advanced £5,000,000 to sixteen local authorities to enable them to carry out their undertakings. He might say that their idea in supporting this measure was to do for London the same sort of thing which had been done with eminent success for the great city of Newcastle-on-Tyne and the districts on the north-east coast. The supply of electricity to Newcastle, and to both banks of the Tyne to Durham, Middlesbrough and the surrounding neighbourhood had made the business of these cities and districts advance by leaps and bounds. He would remind his hon. friends that if they did not seize this opportunity of settling the question for London, he saw no prospect of anything being done for London for many years to come.

Sir John Benn.

*MR. DEPUTY - SPEAKER (Mr. CALDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid.): Order: the hon. Member cannot go into the merits of the Bill.

*SIR JOHN BENN said he would confine himself to the question before the House, and ask hon. Members to listen to the advice of two or three great Committees which had declared that the London County Council was the proper purchasing authority, as having the greatest interest in the matter. Although the London County Council was at present under the sway of the Party who sat on the opposite side of the House, it was united on this great question as to who should be the purchasing authority.

*MR. RADFORD (Islington, E.) said that whilst the instruction moved by the Secretary to the Board of Trade seemed to be to him inadequate and not satisfactory, inasmuch as it left untouched the extraordinary purchase clause, he did not think it would be improved by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dartford. The hon. Member for Devonport—the junior Member—the knighted Member—had given them some reasons which had no great effect on him, as to why they should vote against the Amendment. The hon. Member had voted against the Second Reading of a similar Bill in 1905, and voted for the Second Reading of this Bill last July, and he believed on the present occasion he intended to show his constituents his versatility by not voting at all. There were no other ways in which he could display his versatility. If they considered the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dartford it really amounted to this, that he proposed to set up for this matter of electric supply a second Water Board. He had the advantage of the hon. Member in this respect only, that it was his misfortune to sit for two or three years as a member of the Metropolitan Water Board, which was the greatest fiasco ever attempted in the name of local government. It was composed of sixty-six members, representing, he believed, about half as many again different constituencies.

They were indirectly elected, so that there was not a single man on the Board who had any electors to whom he could appeal or who could call him to account for his conduct. They came from widely distant areas, and the questions discussed in the Water Board were only questions that he might call topographical. They referred to the conflicting interests of different districts which were covered by the Board. There was added to this the vice which was incident to the proposal of his hon. friend that members were elected by different authorities who came into being by elections at different dates. The result was that a man had no sooner become familiar with the routine of the Board than he was happily rejected by his constituents and replaced by somebody else.

MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Mr. CALDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid.): To a certain extent the hon. Member is in order, but he is going too much into detail in the matter.

*MR. RADFORD said that as soon as he got to know by sight a man on the Metropolitan Water Board he had been rejected by his constituents and was there no more.

MR. BARNARD (Kidderminster) dissenting.

*MR. RADFORD said his hon. friend who interrupted him was an instance of the topographical structure of the Metropolitan Water Board. He represented an obscure district he believed in Hertford or some distant county, and was now dominating the Water Board as its Chairman. It was a proposal to reconstruct a Board of this kind which came from the hon. Member for Dartford. He had not told them how many authorities there were who owned electrical undertakings, but there were thirteen in the county of London and he believed twice as many outside, so that they would probably have a composite Board displaying all those topographical indiscretions to which he had referred, and it would be such a travesty of local government as that for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin was responsible.

It seemed to him that the state of things in which they had a great governing body like London providing services for some of the outside areas was to some extent anomalous, but it was not a practical difficulty and in the case of some of the great municipalities of the country it had worked with excellent success. It had been felt in Manchester and elsewhere that the functions of municipal service which were exercised by a municipality might well be extended beyond the limits of the borough with general satisfaction. He was prepared to accept the instruction of the President of the Board of Trade, but he hoped when the time came the instruction would be extended so that it might touch the purchase clause which was the essence of the whole measure.

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) thought the debate showed how difficult this whole matter was. Here they had a conflict between the outside and the inside areas. The hon. Member for Dartford and the hon. Member for Essex came there in conflict with the London County Council, which the Board of Trade suggested should be put into the Bill as the purchasing authority. When they came inside the county they found the hon. Member for Islington, who was leading an attack on behalf of the inside municipal areas, fighting in conflict with the central authority, and so it was from beginning to end. Whether with regard to electric supply in bulk, water supply, or the Port of London, or any big question affecting the enormous population of this great part of the country they had these same difficulties perpetually arising. When they were asked: Why do not you settle things in London as they do in Glasgow or Birmingham or Manchester? the answer was: Because there is no unity whatever in London. They had a population that lived in what was called the administrative county area administered by the County Council. They had outside districts beyond the county area which were as much London as Charing Cross was, and yet they could get no unity inside the area, and it did not matter how they might fight inside the area. They could have the hon. Member for Dartford with them when they were talking about unification, or the City Corporation, but directly it touched a district on the fringe of London that he happened to represent, local pressure was brought to bear upon him, he lost all the great patriotism of a great city, he was prepared to denounce his friends, and say it was due to their mismanagement that they lost control of the water supply of London. This only went to show how extremely difficult a problem this was for the Board of Trade to settle, and, as far as he was concerned, he was very glad the Board of Trade had put down this instruction. He could understand hon. Gentlemen opposite raising an objection to the instruction, but he could not understand hon. Gentlemen on that side opposing the Board of Trade. Why had the Board of Trade put this instruction on the Paper? It had been put down, he believed, because a great desire existed that the undertaking should be purchasable, not by an unknown and uncreated body, but by the central authority which controlled the largest area and the largest supply. This was the only authority that the Board of Trade could put in the Bill. Some day when the purchase took place the question raised by the hon. Member for Dartford would be very natural and proper to be considered, and of course it would come up. Who would propose that Dartford should be left entirely out of representation on the management of the bulk supply scheme? But directly they came to put in any other authority than the County Council they found themselves in the exact position that the hon. Member for Dartford found himself in, that he had to put down an Amendment which was absolutely impracticable, and which no Parliament could possibly accept. Fancy the Board of Trade putting down an instruction in the words proposed by the hon. Member. There had never been known such a thing. The Metropolitan Board of Works was not as bad as that. The hon. Member denounced the Water Board, but it was far better than the proposal that he had on the Paper. Directly they had an alternative to the proposal put forward by the Board of Trade they found themselves in a great difficulty, and that was the essence of the whole problem. What went to make up London? What was outside London? An hon. Member said that if they could have this bulk supply Bill giving London and its outside areas cheap electricity, under the port authority Bill they would at once get cheap electricity and the outside areas would be able to supply it. Fancy saying the Port of London was an outside area of London.

MR. WHITEHEAD said the hon. Baronet had entirely misrepresented what he said. He had said that under the Port of London Bill 42 miles of the county of Essex was taken and came under the control of the inhabitants, the merchants, and the County Council of London, and Essex had no representation at all. He was defending the right of Essex to be on the authority.

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL said he understood the hon. Member to argue that this 42 miles of the Port area, if left outside and if the instruction was not passed, would be able to give a great impetus to their trade, and that they would benefit very largely in consequence. Whatever view they took this was an excellent illustration of the position of London. The Government had promoted a Port of London Bill, and one of the first things required by that Port would be a supply of cheap electricity for the working of electric cranes. The Port of London had not got that, and did anyone say it was in an outside area? He was bound to say it was not an outside area. Whether they were dealing with tramways, electricity, or water, they could not take an artificial line, say up the Edgware Road, and say that beyond that was not part of London, any more than they could take Bow or Stratford and say that that was the end of London. He said that representation was essential in these outside districts, but there was nothing inconsistent in that with what the Board of Trade had put upon the Paper. The Board was bound to put in somebody which existed to-day, and when the time came it would no doubt be the case that these outside areas would get representation. They had tried on the London County Council to settle this question, and he thought it would have been far better if the London County Council had been left to settle it, but the municipal solution of this great problem having been considered impossible, he maintained that it was not just to deny to London the right to bring itself into line with the other great cities of the world. He should have no alternative but to support the instruction put down by the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. BONAR LAW (Camberwell, Dulwich) said this had been a very pretty family quarrel, and he felt that it was almost a pity for him to interfere. He must say that he had listened with the greatest possible amazement to the speeches of the two hon. Members who used to represent the county council. He remembered perfectly well what they were told when they were on those benches—and it was quite possible that change of benches had some undesirable effect on those who sit on the front benches—he remembered hearing something like the eloquent words which the hon. Member used about the success of this electricity proposal elsewhere, and he pointed out then precisely what was pointed out now, that unless the measure of 1905 were adopted they would not succeed in getting cheap electricity for London. But he did not convince, for example, the hon. Member who was most violently opposed to that scheme. All he said about that was, not that the right hon. Gentleman had not a right to change his views, but that the arguments which were obvious to him to-night, were obvious to them three years ago, and were quite as effective then as they were now. He was bound to say that he entirely sympathised with the main principles of the President of the Board of Trade in what he had done with regard to this Bill, although he thought they would not commend themselves to hon. Gentlemen below the gangway. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman was taking a proper and statesmanlike view of the interests of London with regard to this matter, but he was bound to say, also, that he could not support the Instruction in the form in which the right hon. Gentleman had put it on the Paper. The hon. Member who spoke last said that it was absolutely necessary to have some authority mentioned in the Bill, but he did not give them any reason for that statement, and there was a reason against it to the extent that the Committee presided over by Lord Cromer definitely decided that there should be power of purchase, but that the body to make the purchase should be left to be determined afterwards by Parliament. The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member who spoke on behalf of the Board of Trade did not quite correctly represent the attitude of the County Council on this matter, and in the proposal which he was going to make, and which he hoped the President of the Board of Trade would accept, he was going to make exactly the proposal which was made in regard to the County Council by Lord Cromer's Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman would add to his instruction words to this effect "or some other public body to be appointed by Parliament," he would vote for the instruction, but otherwise he must vote against it. He could not support the Amendment, for many reasons which had been pointed out. It was a perfectly impracticable proposal to set up an authority now, which was to be the purchasing authority so many years hence, if this proposal came into operation. And it was not only impracticable for that reason, but because the democratic principle on which the hon. Gentleman relied must apply to local authorities who did not own their electrical supplies as well as to the local authorities who did. He thought, therefore, he might expect that the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment would himself support his suggestion, which was that the purchasing power should remain, but that it should be vested not definitely in the County Council, but in the County Council or some other body which Parliament might think was more fitted for the purpose. He thought he could convince the President of the Board of Trade that the proposal he made was the only possible proposal under the circumstances. He could understand that the right hon. Gentleman thought it necessary to put the Motion down in this form, but he was in a different position from a certain number of his own supporters, who were not very fond of this proposal, and if it was going to make it easier for him to move this instruction, he was quite right to do so, provided he did not do any injustice to any other body. The right hon.

Gentleman had to work with the tools he had got, and to make the best use he could of them. Let the right hon. Gentleman consider what the proposal meant. The district covered by this Bill was, he thought, three or four times the size of the area covered by the London County Council at this moment. The population within the London County Council area covered by the Bill was far more important at the moment than the population outside; but a constant change in this respect was going on, and it by no means followed that the business done by this new company in the County Council area would be the most important even under existing conditions of population. The company could only enter into competition with existing bodies supplying electricity on terms so onerous that for practical purposes such competition was out of the question. So that, obviously, their business would not grow in districts now well supplied, but would more and more extend in the outer areas where there was not such a good supply. It would be unjust from every point of view if the body that created the largest part of the business was then left without any control. But there was a monetary consideration. If the company were successful, that would represent a valuable asset at the end of the purchasing period. Did the right hon. Gentleman propose that a valuable sum of money due to areas outside the London County Council area should be transferred from those to the London County Council itself? There was, as another consideration, a possibility that the municipal tendencies of Members below the gangway opposite might run their course, and that it would come to be regarded that the best way of running these businesses was to lease them to private enterprise. [Loud MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh!" and "No."] He threw that out as a suggestion, but, of course, hon. Members opposite might know a great deal more about the future than he did, and they might be right and he might be wrong, but it could not be denied that it was a possible suggestion. They must remember that the monetary consideration was just the same whether the undertaking was worked by the London County Council or by another municipal body or under lease, and supposing that happened and the undertaking were leased again to a company, did the right hon. Gentleman actually suppose that the monetary payment for that lease was to be given, not to the districts where the money was made, but to the London County Council, which had nothing to do with the way in which it was made? Obviously this was a consideration which must be seriously entertained. He dared say the hon. Gentleman would tell them that if the bulk of the business was done outside the London County Council area, Parliament could alter the conditions imposed by the Bill. That was perfectly true; it could alter anything, but he asked the House to remember that it would be a long time before it was known definitely whether this was going to be a profitable enterprise or not. If the name of the County Council alone appeared in the Bill, during all the years between now and the time of purchase the County Council would regard it as an asset to which they were entitled, a vested interest would have grown up which was to be their property, and Parliament could not alter the conditions without much greater difficulty and appearance of hardship than would be the case if the proposal he was making were adopted, and the London County Council were put in, as a possible authority, and some other authority were also recognised as possible by Parliament. If the right hon. Gentleman did not accept his suggestion, it was his responsibility, and he should vote against the instruction because it seemed so unjust. His proposal was that it should be left to some public body to be appointed by Parliament. He could not himself conceive any reason whatever why the right hon. Gentleman should object to it except, as he had suggested, that it might be more agreeable to his friends below the gangway, who, he supposed, were not in favour of the proposal as a whole, to have the London County Council alone named as the purchasing authority. If an outsider could judge of these matters, he did not think it would remove the opposition in the least of the hon. Members below the gangway who objected to private enterprise on any terms. On the contrary, they would recognise that, if the Bill were to go through, and if there were to be a purchasing authority, it was only fair and just that that authority should be decided upon when Parliament knew what the conditions were to be.

*MR. DICKINSON (St. Pancras, N.) said he was very much obliged to the hon. Member for Dulwich for the speech he had made. He must have cleared the air very considerably. He had said he would only vote for the instruction if there were included in it a definite injunction to the Committee that the purchasing authority should be some body to be set up at some distant future date.

MR. BONAR LAW: Or the London County Council.

*MR. DICKINSON said he might point out to the hon. Gentleman that that was precisely what the Bill did. It was because the Bill did that that they attached so very great importance to the instruction the President of the Board of Trade was moving. The Bill itself said that the undertaking of the company should be liable to be purchased by any county council or joint-committee of county councils, body, or trustees, or other public body or body who might be authorised by Parliament to purchase the undertaking. It was precisely because that was so very clear and definite that the London Members, or at any rate a large proportion of London Members, were anxious that the House should once and for all settle this question. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Dulwich wanted the question postponed, and said that possibly the municipal idea would then have run out its course. He and those acting with him were, however, firmly convinced, and had been throughout, that the only right solution of the question of electricity supply in London was that it should be in the possession of the municipal authorities, and it was because they were so firmly convinced of the necessity that this undertaking should be in the hand of the municipal authorities that they preferred to make it perfectly certain that this would ultimately be the case. If the question were left unsettled for another four or five years things might happen both inside and outside the House that might make it impossible for them to secure to posterity the possession of this undertaking. It was, he could not help thinking, unfortunate that the debate should take place on the Second Reading of a Bill for which no one in the House, neither a Government Department nor a private Member, was responsible. The Bill emanated from private individuals, and, of course, could not expect to command the support of the House in its entirety. It would have been very much better that the Bill should have come before them after having undergone the investigation of a Committee; but that, of course, was impossible, and it was because they were anxious that a Committee of the House of Commons, filled with responsibility to do what it could for the best for London, should consider the proposals in the Bill and see whether they could not be so shaped that they would be ultimately for the best advantage of London, that they were so anxious that it should get to a Committee with this one definite instruction, that the purchasing authority should be the London County Council.

MR. BONAR LAW: May I interrupt the hon. Member? I understood him to say that the London County Council was anxious that it alone should be put in as the purchasing authority. If so, that is not so. They put the proposal I have urged before the House to-night.

*MR. DICKINSON said he did not say that the London County Council had done that. He said the London Liberal Members were anxious for it. Now that the hon. Gentleman had challenged him as to what the County Council did say, the House should know what the views of the County Council were. He had the Report issued by Mr. Felix Cassell, the Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee, of 22nd July, 1908, in which it was said that the President of the Board of Trade would on the Second Reading move an instruction to the Committee dealing with the Bill, to the effect that the Council should be named as the purchasing authority. The Report concluded—

“ We do not think that the Council should oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, or that it should offer any resistance to the instructions referred to above.”

He therefore thought he was justified in saying that the County Council, even as at present constituted, would favour the instruction before the House.

MR. BONAR LAW said he was very sorry to interrupt, but this really was a question of fact open to everybody who read the evidence. What the hon. Member had read was a statement by a member of the Council, by the chairman of a committee; but the evidence on which he (the hon. Member speaking) made his statement was the definite proposal urged in Lord Cromer's Committee by the County Council.

*MR. DICKINSON said he thought that was perfectly accurate. The present County Council appeared before Lord Cromer's Committee, and at that time they agreed to the Report of the Bill, but it was after that that negotiations took place with the President of the Board of Trade. The Parliamentary Committee then brought up this formal Report, and it came before the Council and was adopted. He wished for one moment to deal with the powers which the County Council or public body or central authority proposed by the hon. Member for Dartford would purchase. He must, with great respect, say that the provisions of the Bill, even though drafted by a private company and not by any Member, had been greatly misrepresented as regarded the actual powers the company were to have and to sell. It had been represented as a huge monopoly. If they had felt it was a monopoly in any shape or form, or that it could be made into a monopoly, they would have been its most strenuous opponents. It was because they had looked into the question carefully and had come to the contrary conclusion that they had advocated it.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) on a point of order asked whether it was in order to discuss the instruction broadly, or whether they must keep to the limited point of the Amendment. He did not want in the least to stop his hon. friend, but he would like to hear whether they might also follow and discuss the instruction broadly.

*MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (MR. CALDWELL): An Amendment having been moved with regard to the purchasing authority, we must keep to that point till it is disposed of. Then it will be open for some further Amendments to be moved when the main question is again set up.

*MR. DICKINSON said he quite understood, thoroughly agreed with, and bowed to the ruling; but he did not think it would interfere with the course of his argument. He was going to point out what was the substance of the matter which would have to be purchased by the authority proposed by the hon. Member for Dartford. There was no monopoly to be purchased. It was perfectly true there were clauses in the Bill, drafted as it was by the company, which might be turned into a monopoly and become as dangerous to the public welfare as the water companies or the tram companies as they existed; but those clauses had never yet been before a Committee of the House, and it had already been announced by the President of the Board of Trade in the debate last July that those clauses would have to be considered carefully, not only by a Committee but also by the House.

*MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: The hon. Member is going rather into the merits of the Bill than keeping to the limited purpose of the Amendment.

*MR. DICKINSON said that at any rate the matter was perfectly open to the consideration of the House on a future occasion. Even under the Bill as it stood, there were no powers which could be really called monopoly powers. The power of purchasing other undertakings might be turned into a monopoly power.

*MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: That is not the limited point of the Amendment.

*MR. DICKINSON thought he might be allowed to say that the powers of the company would be the power of producing electricity and of selling it to those distributors who required it. There would be no compulsion to take it, or on anyone to receive it. That seemed to him a very important consideration from all points of view, and especially from the point of view of his hon. friend the Member for Dartford. Representing the interests of the Dartford Council, the hon. Member objected to something which he thought would place the London County Council in a position of supremacy over the Dartford Council. It would do no such thing. All it would do would be to enable the London County Council, in the place of the company, to offer cheap electricity to those distributors who desired to have it. Whatever was the purchasing authority, the promoting company would, with few exceptions, have no power of dealing direct with the consumers, and therefore, the interest of the consumer and the interest of the public would be entirely in the hands of the distributors and the councils in London. That being so, of course, the question arose whether they could appoint another public authority as producer in the place of the London County Council, but that proposal had been before several Committees, all of whom had come to the conclusion that the County Council must be the authority. Those who advocated this proposal did not desire to injure the places that surrounded London, but were anxious to assist them in every way, and if any proposal could be made which would really be better than this proposal for establishing an authority for the provision of this current electricity which would be sold to the various distributors, they would be only too willing to consider it. He could not help thinking that that was a matter for Committee and not for discussion on the Second Reading. He hoped the House would decide that this question of how the supply of bulk electricity was to be furnished in the future should be settled now once for all, and that they would be able to go ahead with the full knowledge of the respective positions of the present distributors, the present companies, the new company, the London County Council, and the other authorities. It was of the utmost importance, in view of the grave difficulty that existed in regard to the purchase of the existing companies, that this question should be settled from the municipal point of view, and he trusted that the House would allow the instruction to pass.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) said the hon. Member for St. Pancras had suggested at the beginning of his speech that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Dulwich was hardly necessary, because the point was met by the Bill which laid it down that the undertaking should be liable to purchase by any county council, or joint-committee of county councils, body of trustees or other public authority or body who might be authorised by Parliament to purchase the undertaking. He did not think the point of the hon. Member for Dulwich was met by this Clause 67, because under it, no authority was definitely named, and the point was that unless some definite instruction was laid down in the Bill further legislation would be necessary before the undertaking could be purchased, and the objection they felt to leaving the matter in this vague state was that Parliament might possibly neglect again to legislate on the subject, and that the purchase powers which were laid down as being in the power of various different bodies might in that way be allowed to lapse unless it was put down once for all that the County Council, or some other body, should be constituted as the purchasing authority. In any case Clause 67 would be overridden by the Instruction of the President of the Board of Trade. If they would also accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dulwich they would guard against the danger of the purchase powers being allowed to lapse and at the same time would not hamper the action of Parliament if in the future they were to decide that somebody still to be created were to take the place of the County Council as purchasing authority. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Dartford was hardly a practicable

one. It was not reasonable to expect the House to legislate for the representation of borough councils fifty years hence. It was quite reasonable to say that the County Council or some other body named by Parliament should exercise these powers, but it was impossible at present to say how the borough councils were to be represented. The difficulty was that if they made the borough councils the purchasing authority they would only have a part of the area represented, because he thought it was only about half the borough councils who had electrical undertakings in their hands. Another difficulty was that under the present law it would be almost impossible for the borough councils to buy out even the distributing agencies, because there was so much overlapping that the cost of buying out would be absolutely prohibitive, owing to the fact that under the Electric Lighting Acts allowance had to be made for severance, and as a result of that it was quite certain that they would have to have some central body. He personally felt it was very difficult to imagine a central body administering electric power and electric lighting schemes unless it was directly elected. They had been told the Water Board was a parallel case. He did not think it was, because after all the Water Board administered water, which was a universal want, and they would probably never reach the day in London when electricity would be used by everybody. Anyhow it was a long way off. But everybody must use water. He imagined even if hon. Members drank alcohol they occasionally washed. He expected the electors of London would not allow an indirectly elected body to charge the rates with the enormous capital expenditure which would be necessary to buy out the existing electric companies, and especially this bulk supply, and for that reason they must have a directly elected central body. His own feeling was that it ought to be the London County Council. Hon. Members had made rather too much of the point that it was not fair for the London County Council to go outside its own area. After all there was a precedent for it. Although the borough councils in London did not supply consumers beyond their borough boundaries it was quite a common thing in the provinces for boroughs to get power to supply gas, water, and even electricity beyond their boundaries, by agreement. This Bill did not propose in any way to compel outside authorities to take the electricity of this bulk supply company, and he therefore thought it would be quite safe to constitute the London County Council as the purchasing authority. At the same time he hoped the Amendment suggested by his hon. friend the Member for Dulwich would be accepted. If, however, it was not, he should certainly vote for the instruction of the President of the Board of Trade, because he thought it was most necessary that there should be some central body in London which should take an interest in the organisation of electric supplies, and which should take a comprehensive view of the whole matter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee) thought the House would feel that, whatever might be thought or said about the London and District Bill on its merits and as a main proposition, this debate had been conclusive with regard to the special point before the House. From almost every quarter of the House they had had speeches on the subject of who should be the ultimate purchasing authority and those who had followed the debate would, he thought, agree, if they were forced to choose between the proposition he had put forward and the proposition advanced by his hon. friend the Member for Dartford, that there was, even among all the tangles of London electricity, one problem which was settled. The hon. Member for Dulwich had suggested an addition to the instruction he had put on the Paper, namely, that they should say the County Council "or some other authority to be fixed by Parliament." He did not see any grave objection to those words in themselves, but he would recommend the House not to adopt them. The Government were seeking by this instruction to indicate a general policy for the future. They were seeking to affirm a principle which would certainly govern these Bills so far as they might progress, and which might govern other Bills if these Bills should not reach maturity. What was that principle? It was a large and simple principle. It was that ultimately, and, for his part, he hoped as soon as possible, there should be one combined, extensive, uniform system of electrical supply for London—for the Metropolitan area—and that the supply should be under the control of the government of London. That was the large, general proposition, and, however they might differ—and the subject was so complicated and vexed, and there were so many cross-currents in it that any man might be pardoned for differing from another—he had the greatest respect for those who took a different view from that which he had put forward—however they might differ upon the main question, surely all those who, from every point of view, would wish to champion the general and large progressive interest of London government could unite in pointing to the London County Council as the future main authority over the electrical supply. He was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman opposite who last spoke and who represented the opinion of the ruling force on the London County Council at the present time, speak no less strongly in support of the prerogative of that great body to be the authority entrusted with this duty than his hon. friends behind him who had spoken. It was not only a question of providing for an authority which was to administer the electrical supply of London when the purchase clauses matured. They had to think of the interval, and they were proposing to assign to a public body purchase rights over a private undertaking, and those rights did not operate until a good number of years had passed. What a safeguard it was to the public interest to vest those rights clearly and unmistakably in a powerful and existing public body, and not to leave it to an embryonic creation which had not yet come into being, something vague, which a Parliament of the future might possibly or might not select or create. How much better it was to have some powerful, trusty custodian of such purchase rights as were secured by the Bill and would ultimately operate. And he was bound to say that when they came to the special question of the merits of the Amendment he felt even greater confidence. As had been pointed out his hon. friend had shown in his speech the vice of his Amendment; he had supported representation on high democratic grounds, and yet by his Amendment he would exclude nearly half the districts concerned from any share in his proposed representation.

MR. ROWLANDS: Not necessarily.

MR. CHURCHILL said it was so because the Amendment was to substitute for the London County Council “a central authority composed of representatives of the municipal authorities owning their electrical supplies within the area covered by the Bill.” There were seventy-seven local authorities within the area, and of these, thirty-five did not own electrical undertakings and so would not be represented at all. The hon. Member had allowed these to slip from his memory, though among them were the City of London, Westminster and Paddington, a great part of central and of southern London. His hon. friend asked the House to create a purchasing body in preference to the London County Council, which would be less representative, less responsible, less competent than the County Council with its experience and ever-growing skill and capacity. This new body would have no rating power, a special statute would be required to effect the purchase, and even if all the difficulties were surmounted, a body would be created that would be but a bad imitation of that Water Board which had been severely criticised on both sides of the House. The question had now been discussed at some length, and he suggested that the House should come to a decision upon the Amendment so that other aspects of the question might be raised by his right hon. friend the Member for Islington and others.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) said he intended to support the Amendment of his hon. friend the Member for Dartford. If the outside areas were compelled to come into this scheme, then they ought to be represented. Those who represented the London County Council seemed to have forgotten the main bone of contention. He happened to be on the Committee which considered the last Bill dealing with the subject promoted by the London County Council. It was proposed under that Bill, as was proposed on this occasion, to take in twenty odd authorities which were not within the jurisdiction of the London County Council at all. Those twenty public authorities could not by any manner of means have any representation on the London County Council, and yet they would be obliged under this Bill at the end of the stated period to sell to the County Council the undertakings which they had secured at great expense. That was a proposal which was now being defended by hon. Members who professed to be Progressives and democrats. The hon. Baronet the Member for Devonport twitted the hon. Member for Dartford with having forgotten his democratic principles. Was it democratic to compel twenty public bodies, well known for their proper and decent management of their affairs, to be dispossessed of the undertakings they had built up with so much labour, energy, and expense, and this without having any representation whatever upon the body taking over their undertakings? Most of the opposition to the London County Council's attempting to deal with this subject of electric supply for London had not come from the authorities within its jurisdiction, but from those twenty or thirty outside local authorities which the London County Council wanted to sweep into its net without giving them any voice whatever in the administration. The hon. Member for Dartford, he understood, was willing to withdraw his Motion, but he objected to that course because he wished to register his protest in the division lobby. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds said that the attempt to include within the jurisdiction of the London County Council those outside areas was not a new proposition, and that the same thing was often done in the case of other large towns, and he mentioned Newcastle as an instance.

MR. WALTER GUINNESS: I do not think I mentioned the case of Newcastle at all.

MR. JOHN WARD said other hon. Members had mentioned Newcastle. At any rate the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds stated that in other towns the taking in of outside areas was often done in the case of gas, water, and electric supply. He wished to point out to the House that the areas to be taken in under this Bill were not the suburbs which sprang up outside provincial towns, but included large towns, and one of the districts to be brought under the jurisdiction of the London County Council was Croydon, which had a population of over 100,000 people, and possessed its own tramway system. Croydon had already proved that it could produce electricity in bulk as cheaply as any body under the control of the London County Council. Such great municipalities as East Ham and West Ham, which were not now in the London County Council area, were to be included under this scheme. Such cases as Bromley in Kent, Kingston-on-Thames, Richmond, and other places, embracing hundreds of thousands of people were to be swept into the net of the London County Council by this proposal. It was surprising to him to notice the peculiar harmony which had so suddenly been proclaimed between the Progressive and Moderate members of the London County Council. This was an attempt by a private corporation to secure powers to compete with outside municipal authorities who had spent millions upon their undertakings, which they were being compelled by agreement to sell upon a shadowy kind of representation. It remained to be proved whether or not under this scheme those outside areas would get a cheaper supply. Was it a sensible proposal to solve this problem by including twenty or thirty outside local authorities who had petitioned against this Bill, and would insist upon debating every line of it? He asked them to consider whether in putting forward these proposals and especially the proposal that the undertaking should be controlled by a private syndicate, they were not running the risk which they wanted to avoid. If the County Council had attempted to deal properly with the County Council area alone, and if they had left the outside districts for the present at least to shift for themselves, there was a sufficient population under the jurisdiction of the Council to enable them to show that they could give as cheap a supply of electricity as it was possible to give. [Cries of "No."] He maintained that was so. He had listened to the evidence of experts, who said that the inclusion of the outside population did not make the slightest difference in the cost of bulk supply. That being so, why did the members of the County Council, whether Progressives or Moderates, insist upon including the outside authorities within the scope of their purchase clause without giving any representation? They were told that it was democratic to refuse representation. It was a curious illustration of democracy. He did not believe that Parliament would allow this body to take possession of millions of capital, and of growing areas that had been developed by the energy, foresight, and municipal enterprise of the people of those districts, without giving them representation. It was a moral certainty that the proposal would not succeed. Those who paid the rates would require to know something about the price. When he listened to the speeches of the Progressive members, and even the Moderate members, of the London County Council, he could not help thinking that they were not nearly so anxious to supply cheap electricity to London as to extend their boundaries over the districts to which they did not propose to give any representation at all.

MR. ROWLANDS said it had been admitted in the debate by speaker after speaker that the local areas were entitled to some representation, and, therefore, the object he had in moving the Amendment had been served. He regretted that the President of the Board of Trade had not been able to accept the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Dulwich. He asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Leave to withdraw being refused,

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Rowlands and Mr. Whitehead.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said that they found themselves that evening in a most unfortunate position. There was no disposition on his part, or on the part of some of his friends for whom he spoke, to give the Government any trouble whatever. This was a private Bill, and he regretted that the Government should have interfered with it at all. He did not like to be dragged into any quarrel with the hon. Member for Dartford or the President of the Board of Trade. The people he wanted to get at were the promoters of this private Bill which he and his friends thought would inflict great injury on London. It was these gentlemen who should bring forward instructions and Amendments, and then they would be able to fight them in the open, and not the Government. He would point out that the instruction was most unsatisfactory when they came to examine its provisions. Everyone who had spoken on that side of the House was agreed that the purchase clause in the Bill was most unsatisfactory. The Secretary to the Board of Education stated that—

“He would not for a moment support the Bill were it not for the important Instruction to be proposed by the President of the Board of Trade, nor did he approve in the least of the proposed terms of purchase which had come from the House of Lords.”

Now, nothing had been done to alter the terms of purchase. To lay it down that the London County Council should be the purchasing authority did not improve this wretched clause. He thought that the object the President of the Board of Trade had in view was too apparent. The right hon. Gentleman wished to pay some deference to the principle of municipal control. They all approved of that, but the House would remark the round-about way by which the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to establish that principle. At the present moment there were some forty local authorities with electric installations. The plan of the Government was to allow this private company under Clause 77 of the Bill to acquire these local authorities' undertakings without coming to Parliament, then to give the company a free run for fifty-three years, and afterwards to protect London by allowing the County Council to purchase the undertaking. The Instruction simply said that the purchasing authority should be the London County Council. What did the London County Council get? The right to purchase; but all rights to purchase depended on the terms on which the purchase might be effected, and the right hon. Gentleman did not give them the slightest comfort with regard to terms. What did his eloquent supporters say in regard to this matter? The junior Member for Devonport was most eloquent, but not on the subject of terms. That hon. Member always thought that he was a London Member, but as a matter of fact he represented a very distant part of the Kingdom. Then his hon. friend the Secretary to the Board of Education also supported the instruction. In fact, all the worst parts of this proposal seemed to come from new Members from Scotland, who hardly had the time to learn the accent before they came to teach old-fashioned, quiet going, London Members how to do their duty to London. The junior Member for Devonport said that the President of the Board of Trade would attend to the purchase clause, and that he would put in what the Liberal Government did in 1870, in regard to the tramways. That arrangement was that the companies should have a free run for twenty-one years, and that then the purchase would be made without the payment for any goodwill. They had heard a good deal about a split among London Members on this question. There was no split; London was solid,
